Mr. CRAPO. I ask unanimous consent that general leave be given to gentlemen who may so desire to print remarks on this subject in the RECORD. I make this request because it is the wish of the committee that the time shall not be extended in the case of those who obtain the floor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is suggested that all who desire to print remarks on this subject in the RECORD shall have leave to do so.

Mr. RICE, of Missouri. I desire to make an inquiry. For how long a time is it proposed that this leave to print shall be extended?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands it to be without limit. The Chair hears no objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] is recognized.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, in discussing this question I shall undertake to answer some of the points made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CRAPO] in favor of the national banks. One of the arguments last made by the gentleman from Massachusetts in favor of the national banking system, and against the proposition submitted by other gentlemen as well as myself, of substituting Treasury notes for bank notes, was that there is a danger of overissue on the part of the Government if the matter of issuing Treasury notes is confined to Congress alone, and that it is better to transfer this power of regulating the volume of paper money to corporations, to gentlemen whose interest it is to subserve private ends, instead of holding that power in the representatives of the people for the public benefit. And he eulogizes further the national banking system because, he says, it has furnished the Government and the people with a paper currency secure and valid everywhere. And why so? What is a national-bank note other than a Treasury note? When gentlemen come to argue this question I want them to answer that proposition. What is a national-bank note to-day other than a state paper? Nothing. It is not redeemable in anything but state paper. It is not based upon coin, but upon paper. It is redeemable in a Treasury note, which is state paper. It is made receivable and payable for all public dues, with certain exceptions, and is therefore essentially nothing more nor less than state paper issued by the Government, and handed over to corporations to circulate and receive the profit of the issues.

From that proposition there is no escape. Under this system is there no danger of banks contracting and expanding the currency, the very danger that the gentleman warns the country against with reference to Treasury notes? Is there no danger with reference to bank notes in the same direction? Why, when the funding bill was up at the last session of Congress we remember that the national banking institutions, in order to dragoon Congress into passing such measures as they thought would redound to their benefit, secured the veto of the bill by bulldozing the President with threats of contracting the currency and inviting a financial panic.

Let gentlemen who are favoring national banks here to-day remember what took place in the Forty-third Congress. That Congress assembled in the midst of a panic greater probably than this country ever experienced before. It was under this national banking system, and it was determined here upon the part of those favoring the national banking system that instead of increasing the volume of legal-tender notes or Treasury notes the banking law should be extended and amended so as to permit banks to issue the money without limit. Banking was made free, and other measures and amendments of the bank law in their interest were made at that Congress. And to-day the same proposition is here. It is contended by the Treasurer that the banks contract and expand this currency in their own interest and not in the interest of the people. And if Congress can overissue Treasury notes, if there is a danger of Congress making these overissues without the intervention and the coercion of banks, then there certainly is still greater danger that this money which we turn over to our banking corporations for their benefit and use may be contracted and expanded at the behest of these corporations, where we know they demand their own terms as to our legislation, or, failing to get their demands, paralyze business with forebodings of financial disasters.

When we are told there is danger of centralization also in the proposition to substitute Treasury notes for bank notes, I reply, Mr. Speaker, that the danger of centralization and revolution in this Government comes not from the people or their representatives here untrammeled by corporations. The danger of centralization, the danger of revolution, the danger of changing our republican form of government to that of an aristocratic form of government, arises from the vast power of the corporations that Congress has built up in this country; among the greatest and most powerful and most to be feared are these banks.

Why, sir, the danger of centralization when the people's representatives are left free to act upon public subjects; when banking corporations that we built up in this land have the power of threatening panic by bulldozing Congress, by saying to us if we do not pass this bill to-day or another bill to-morrow in their interest the country will go to ruin, and they will bring panics and financial disaster upon us, the danger of centralization is in the power of those institutions, and not in the power of Congress representing the people of this country.

What are the propositions that we are to meet to-day? I have the reports here of the Secretary of the Treasury and also of the Treasurer of the United States and the Comptroller of the Currency all conflicting upon this subject. I will send to the Clerk's desk and ask the Clerk to read what I have marked on page 190 of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The Clerk read as follows:

If, on the other hand, the corporate existence of the national banks shall be extended, all the advantages of the existing system will be preserved, subject to such amendments as may be hereafter found necessary; while the circulation of the banks, which is the principal objection urged against the system, will, under existing laws, diminish in volume as the public debt shall be reduced.

Mr. BLAND. I ask the Clerk to turn to page 430 and read what I have marked there.

The Clerk read as follows:

SILVER CERTIFICATES

There was a large increase during the fiscal year in the amount of silver certificates in circulation, the amount outstanding at the close of the year being $51,166,530 as compared with $12,374,270 outstanding June 30, 1880. This increase is due in part to the demand for notes for circulation, but chiefly to the operation of the departmental circular of September 18, 1880, under which exchange on the subtreasuries in the West and South payable in silver certificates is furnished by the Department for deposits of gold coin with the assistant treasurer in New York. Under this circular large amounts of silver certificates, chiefly of the denominations of ten and twenty dollars, have been paid out at the sub-treasuries in New Orleans, Saint Louis, Chicago, and Cincinnati, for the purpose of moving the cotton and other crops. Since the close of the fiscal year the circulation of the certificates has still further increased; the amount now outstanding being $64,149,910, of which $11,309,470 is held by the Treasury. The amount of silver dollars in the Treasury at this date is $65,949,279, less than $2,000,000 in excess of the outstanding certificates.

As the certificates cannot be issued in excess of the dollars held by the Treasury, the limit of their issue is likely soon to be reached, although, of course, the certificates held by the Treasury in its cash can be paid out. Aside from this limitation, the issue of the silver certificates has little relation to the standard silver dollar. The Treasury pays them out because it finds it necessary to utilize in some way the enormous stock of silver which it is carrying, and they are taken by the public without regard to the silver dollars behind them, because they constitute a convenient form of paper currency. To the extent of nearly two thirds of the amount coined, the coinage and attempted circulation of the standard silver dollar have resulted simply in an addition to the paper circulation of the country. Whatever the ultimate result may be, the immediate effect has not been without positive advantages. The volume of the United States notes is limited by law, while the national banks do not find a sufficient profit in issuing circulation on United States bonds at present prices to induce them to supply the demand for additional paper circulation, caused by the increase of business. The issue of silver certificates, by meeting this demand, has averted what might have proved to be a serious public inconvenience.

Mr. BLAND. Now, I want the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CRAPO] and the majority of the Committee on Banking and Currency, who have reported a bill to demonetize silver, to answer that argument of the Treasurer. He says that the coinage of silver dollars and the issue of silver certificates has averted what otherwise might have been an incalculable disaster to the country. That is refreshing in connection with what I will read from the report of the Secretary himself on that subject, as follows:

There need be no apprehension of a too limited paper circulation. The national banks are ready to issue their notes in such quantity as the laws of trade demand, and as security therefor the Government will hold an equivalent in its own bonds.

The embarrassments which are certain to follow from the endeavor to maintain several standards of value, in the form of paper currency, are too obvious to need discussion.

It is recommended, therefore, that measures be taken for a repeal of the act requiring the issue of such certificates and the early retirement of them from circulation.

And yet an officer in that Department who is noted for his integrity and his ability, who has been there for years and has studied this question, tells us solemnly to-day that the issuing of these silver certificates has been necessary in the past. And we are told by the Comptroller of the Currency, in one of his arguments in favor of continuing the banks, that their circulation will diminish from time to time. Now, if it is to be diminished from now on, and we are to carry out the further recommendation of the Committee on Banking and Currency and of the Secretary of the Treasury and demonetize silver, I want to know what the friends of the national banks propose to do for the people?

Let the gentleman from Massachusetts answer that proposition. He wants to know what will be better than the national banks; and he proposes to wait until some system shall be proposed that will suit him better than the banking system before he will stop his advocacy of national banks. Yet the records of the Treasury Department show that the banking system has the dry-rot to-day and is expiring. They contract and expand the currency as suits their own interests, as is shown by the following from page 364 of the Treasurer's report, 1880:

A similar question arose concerning the deposits for the retirement of bank circulation under the fourth section of the act, which was decided in the same manner, so that a bank desiring to reduce its circulation may accomplish its object by depositing in the Treasury gold coin, or silver dollars, or United States notes. The original theory of this provision was that whenever the paper circulation of the country became excessive, the redundancy would be cured by the deposit by the banks of United States notes for the retirement of their circulation. Now, however, that the banks may reduce their circulation by the deposit of coin, it is evident that the original theory of the act is destroyed. In fact, the question was raised by banks desiring to reduce their circulation, who averred that it was difficult, if not impossible, to obtain United States notes for the purpose, plainly showing that banks may desire to reduce their circulation when the currency is already deficient.

Now, on top of that he has reported to this House a bill doing away with the only thing that can supply the place of national-bank notes, unless we substitute Treasury notes for them; that is, silver coin and silver certificates.

Mr. DINGLEY. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion at that point? I understood him to say that the majority of the Committee on Banking and Currency had reported a bill demonetizing silver?

Mr. BLAND. Unless I can have my time extended somewhat, I shall desire to occupy the hour myself. I would like to yield to gentlemen for questions, and will do so if I can have my time extended.

Mr. DINGLEY. I desire to say that the bill to which the gentleman refers does not propose to demonetize silver, but to limit the coinage of silver to the actual demands of the people.

Mr. BLAND. You want to further limit, then, the coinage, practically to demonetize it.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] may have his time extended so that he can answer any questions which gentlemen may desire to ask him.

Mr. CRAPO. I must object to that.

Mr. BLAND. I want to make a suggestion in all fairness to gentlemen on both sides. It is not often that I occupy the attention of the House. I am sure I have never trespassed upon the patience of gentlemen. But this is a subject which deserves and should receive full consideration and discussion. If I should not get through the remarks I propose to submit within the hour, I trust the courtesy of the House will be extended to me for a short time.

Mr. HARDENBERGH. I desire to state that I will yield to the gentleman fifteen minutes of the time to which I am entitled as a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. BLAND. I thank the gentleman. The gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CRAPO,] in his argument for the continuance of the national banks, and in defense of the national-bank system, referred to the great benefits rendered by the banks during the war. Suppose we admit for the sake of argument that at that time they worked great benefit. But there were other patriots in the land besides those engaged in national banking; there were other capitalists who should be considered as well as these bankers. The great mass of the producing people of the country, who must pay all the expenses of these corporations, should be considered as well as the banks; for the people were as patriotic as were the banks.

What was the effect of banking institutions during the war, and what has been their effect since in demanding legislation on the part of Congress? What have been the influences brought to bear by the banks? During the war they purchased bonds for legal-tender notes, when those notes were worth but sixty cents on the dollar in coin. They converted into bonds bearing coin interest paper worth but sixty or seventy cents on the dollar, bonds to full amount of face value of this depreciated paper.

Had the Government gone into the markets of the world and offered its bonds to be sold for coin, and had sold them for sixty or seventy cents on the dollar, we would then have understood the transaction. We would have seen that we were losing thirty or forty and, in some instances, probably fifty cents on the dollar in that transaction.

Yet we lost the same amount by converting these paper issues into bonds; paper money that was depreciated on account of the issues of the national banks themselves. The legal-tender notes issued during the war, had there been no other issues, had bank notes not been issued, might have stood near par all the time. But every bank note that was issued came in competition with the legal-tender notes, and depreciated them to that extent. These banks and their circulation depreciated the paper of the Government for which the bonds were sold, and instead of being a benefit to the Government during the war they cost it not less than $500,000,000.

More than that. When they had secured these bonds at a low price and had control of them, they came into the Halls of Congress and demanded that bonds thus payable in paper money below par should be made a coin bond. By the act of 1869 Congress pledged the faith of this nation to redeem its public debt in coin. This is a specimen of the influence brought to bear by the national banks upon the legislation of this country in the past. Instead of being a public benefit these banks have been a public curse; instead of being in the interest of the people they have been the grandest robbers of the tax-payers of this country that ever existed under any government. Yet we are asked now to continue them. Why? Because the Comptroller of the Currency says that their circulation is gradually going out, and that this objection to them is not longer to be urged. He suggests furthermore that we should not consider what shall be substituted for these national banks when they have ceased to exist; that some time in the future will be early enough to consider that question. But, sir, we are paying off the national debt at the rate of over $100,000,000 a year, and, unless we cease to pay off this debt, unless this bill means, as I think it does, that when we have continued and rechartered these banks the next legislation asked on the part of Congress will be to cease the payment of the public debt in order to maintain the banks, the basis on which the national-bank currency has rested must shortly pass away. The indefinite continuation of the national debt is what the Comptroller of the Currency invites us to, although he has not the hardihood to say so; for it is confessed here that the banking system cannot exist much longer unless we stop immediately the rapid payment of the public debt. This bill is simply the preliminary and forerunner of other legislation looking to the perpetuation of the national debt in order to perpetuate the national banks. Otherwise this bill means nothing; it is a mere brutum fulmen, because the banks whose charters it continues and the very system it seeks to uphold are expiring—are dying from day to day, and in a few short years must go out of existence.

We hear it proclaimed throughout the country to-day that a national debt is a national blessing. There are in this country, and have been since the formation of our Government, those who believe that the nearer we pattern after the Government of Great Britain the nearer are we to perfection. They believe in aristocratic government; a government controlled by wealth and power as against the people; a government in which the aristocratic classes shall control the masses. It is the class who thus believe, who proclaim, that a national debt is a national blessing. Why? Because in accordance with the English system we can bank upon a perpetual debt. It is this species of legislation which in a few short years has raised up in this country millionaires by the thousand, when, before the war, scarcely one was heard of. The great contrast between extreme poverty and extreme wealth in this country is steadily and surely marking the line between the aristocratic and the laboring classes of our people.

Mr. Speaker, I have a bill which I propose to print as a part of my remarks, and which I hope to have considered when this question is under discussion in Committee of the Whole. I will now state the principal features of the bill. The first three or four sections correspond with the bill of the gentleman from Massachusetts, in providing for the continuance of the national banks as banks of discount and deposit. In this way will be avoided the calamity of which the gentleman from Massachusetts speaks, compelling the banks to wind up and thereby discommode and inconvenience their customers. But in this bill I propose to cut off their circulation.

The next proposition of the bill is that the banks, as their charters expire, shall go into liquidation in accordance with the provisions for voluntarily going into liquidation under the Revised Statutes. In other words, they shall deposit in the Treasury lawful money for the purpose of taking up their circulation. I provide further that the money thus deposited shall be counted as surplus revenue, and paid out like other surplus revenue in the Treasury, in the current expenditures of the Government and in the redemption and extinguishment of the national debt. In this way I would require these banks to redeem their circulation, something that they never have done and under the pending bill never will do. Gentlemen talk about these banks redeeming their circulation; but I say that for the last twenty years the banks have had the use of the Government paper furnished to them which they have put out at interest; but never a dollar have they redeemed.

No man goes to the bank counter and demands the redemption of a national-bank bill. Why? Because it is practically Government paper, and is as good as the paper in which it would be redeemed. The pending bill proposes to extend the charters of these banks for twenty years and thus give them for the term of forty years the use of the Government paper without costing them a dollar. That is one of the objects of the pending bill. It proposes to extend the time for the banks to redeem their circulation, and they know it. Yet they come here and claim that they are acting for the benefit of the people. This is one of the swindles to be perpetrated.

If they are compelled to redeem their circulation at once in lawful money of the Government, and if this money be deposited in the Treasury we can use it as other surplus revenues are used, in redeeming the bonds upon which these banks are doing business; and in order to take up their circulation we can issue Treasury notes having the same monetary functions as the bank notes. As these bank notes come into the Treasury in the payment of taxes and otherwise the bill which I have prepared provides that the Secretary of the Treasury shall issue circulating Treasury notes to take their place.

In this there is no contraction—none whatever. You will have in circulation the same kind of paper that is out to-day, Government paper issued by Congress; for the bank paper is nothing but Government paper issued under the authority of Congress, the banks being the agents for its circulation. How many agents and commissions do we want in this land? Are we not capable of doing our own business? Thus, sir, I would issue Government paper redeemable like bank notes, and taking the place of the bank notes, and the money deposited by the banks can be used for current expenditures and for the payment of the public debt. Thus the banks will be required to redeem the circulation of which they have had the use for the last twenty years. The money paid in by them to redeem this circulation will be utilized in extinguishing the public debt. By the year 1885, three years from to-day, with the amount of revenue now coming into the Treasury and with the revenue which will come in under my bill, we can redeem the last outstanding 3½ per cent. bond and thus wind up the banking institutions. They will not then longer survive.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I would like to ask the gentleman whether he proposes to have the Treasury note redeemed by the Government?

Mr. BLAND. I do.

Mr. HUTCHINS. You do?

Mr. BLAND. Yes, sir; precisely as the bank note is now redeemed.

Mr. HUTCHINS. Then you would have a dollar of gold or silver in the Treasury to redeem each dollar of Treasury notes?

Mr. BLAND. I will explain that; and I would have done so if the gentleman had not made the inquiry. The bank note to-day is redeemed by a greenback. There is not a dollar of coin behind the note of the national bank to-day.

I propose to issue Treasury notes that will have behind them legal-tender notes, and to let the Secretary of the Treasury hold as a reserve in the Treasury such coin as may be necessary to keep the legal tenders at par. The Secretary of the Treasury will reserve in the Treasury enough coin to keep them at par.

Mr. HUTCHINS. Do I understand the gentleman to say that he would allow such an amount of coin to remain in the Treasury as the Secretary of the Treasury alone should deem sufficient to redeem those notes?

Mr. BLAND. The gentleman knows that is the law to-day, and that by the law as it now exists the Secretary of the Treasury fixes his own reserve. There is no act of Congress that limits the power of the Secretary of the Treasury to fix this reserve, and I hope the gentleman from New York or some other gentleman will introduce a bill on that subject.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I understood the gentleman to say that he was in favor of issuing the Treasury notes by the Government and having in the Treasury a sufficient amount of coin to redeem them; that amount to be kept there and to be such as the Secretary of the Treasury in his judgment might think proper. Now, did I understand him correctly?

Mr. BLAND. I have already answered the gentleman's question, but I will answer it again, and I hope then my time will not be further taken up by interruptions on this point. I do not propose to disturb the present condition of things except to issue Treasury notes having behind them legal-tender notes to take the place of the national-bank notes. The Treasury note I propose to issue will be redeemable like the national-bank note. I propose to issue a Treasury note the same as a bank note, and that has the same thing behind it as a bank note.

So far as a contest between the bank note and the Treasury note is concerned that is all sufficient for the purposes of my argument. Now, Mr. Speaker, I will read from the report of the Comptroller of the Currency, submitted December 5, 1881, in which, on page 188, is the following statement:

> The principal reason urged by those who favor a discontinuance of the national banking system is that money can be saved by authorizing the Government to furnish circulation to the country; in other words, that the profit to the banks upon their circulation is excessive. Sixteen years ago the banks had on deposit, as security for circulation, $276,000,000 in United States bonds, of which amount nearly two hundred millions was in 6 percents and seventy-six millions in 5 percents. The banks now hold thirty-two millions of 4½ percents; ninety-two millions of 4 percents; two hundred and forty-one millions of 3½ percents, converted from 5 and 6 percents; and also three and a half millions of Pacific Railroad sixes.

For sixteen years, then, Mr. Speaker, these national banks held bonds drawing 5 and 6 per cent. interest to the amount here stated. What was their profit at that time? It is claimed there is but little profit in national banks, and I admit there is not so much profit now as formerly. But during the war, and shortly afterward, their profits were very large. I have made a calculation and I find during these sixteen years referred to in the report of the Comptroller of Currency the banks drew as interest $256,000,000 in coin, and on bonds that did not cost them over sixty to seventy cents in the dollar of coin. Their circulation is $248,000,000 of banking paper, which was at a discount with legal-tender notes during all that time. Of course it was redeemable in them. Now, if they are compelled to redeem their circulation in lawful money they will not have refunded to the Treasury the amount they have already drawn. In other words, Mr. Speaker, the tax-payers of this Government have paid into the coffer of the national banks during this sixteen years in coin more than sufficient to redeem the last bank note which they issued. They have had it all for nothing. That is where they received their profit, and therein lies the infamy of a system we are called on now in this House to continue.*

If we are to continue them as they now exist they will cost us not less than $12,000,000 annually, and if they are to exist for twenty years under this new life they will then have received from the Government sufficient money, and more than enough, to twice redeem the last note the Government has ever given to them. They will have lived for forty years, and the circulation absolutely given to them without charge and to be used at their own discretion for that time.

Under this bill they can be rechartered for twenty years more, and then for twenty years more, and so on perpetually. So that this proposition is nothing more nor less than the perpetuation of this whole national banking system. That is just what it is.

They are never to redeem their circulation. Gentlemen who can stand upon this floor and defend such a system or can go before their constituents and tax-payers and defend such a system have, in my judgment, more ability than I give any gentleman on this floor credit for. It is absolutely indefensible, this giving to these national banks, in addition to all they have already received, $12,000,000 a year bounty for twenty years longer.

Many newspapers throughout the country complain and denounce Congress as extravagant if we happen to give ten or twelve million dollars to improve the vast waterways of this country. If we appropriate five or six million dollars for improving the navigation of the Mississippi River and its tributaries from mouth to sources to secure cheap transportation for the vast products of the Mississippi Valley, worth untold millions to the Government, we are denounced as being extravagant. Yet, sir, they soundly berate us if we intimate an objection to subsidizing national banks at the rate of twelve millions annually.

Let us subsidize the Mississippi and its tributaries at the rate of twelve millions per annum for the half of the twenty years, and we will have deserved the thanks of the people. Stop the banks and give it to the river. Mr. Speaker, I remind gentlemen this will go home to the people in the coming elections, and gentlemen who vote to perpetuate this system will find it hard to explain their action in favor of this bill. It shall go before the country, and such a system of legalized plunder, never before heard of under any form of government, shall have its infamy denounced in terms which are befitting and just.

They cannot exist, sir, unless we continue these bonds and pay this subsidy; and that is what this bill means, as I said a moment ago, if it means anything. Then the issue comes up squarely and fairly, are we in favor of continuing the public debt indefinitely or perpetuating that debt in order to perpetuate the national banks? It is nothing else. It can mean nothing else; and that is what this bill means, or it means nothing. I have sometimes tried in my feeble way to convince gentlemen favoring the national banking system that there might be something else under the shining sun that was better, and the gentleman from Massachusetts stated in his speech that he would favor the national banks until some one devised a better system. That is the argument that is offered. But I have not seen one of them yet who would devise another scheme or who could agree with any one else as to the system they could devise to take its place, and I would like to know what better friends the national banks have than those gentlemen who claim that there is no better system or plan that can be devised?

Then, sir, if no better system than the national-bank system can be devised by Congress, we are driven to the necessity of stopping the payment of the national debt to continue them. If we believe that is wrong, we are recreant to the trust reposed in us if we do not now and here seek to devise a better system, because according to the reports of the Comptroller of the Currency, and according to the admitted statement of the Committee on Banking and Currency, if their doctrine is to be carried out, and we continue to pay off the bonds, we start on the downward road of contraction, contraction, contraction!

What does that mean? Need I point you to the contraction of the currency from 1873 to 1879 and to its effects? Need I cite you to all authors of monetary science as to the effect of contracting the volume of currency upon the business of a country? Why, sir, a contraction in the volume of currency going on from day to day means simply enhanced value of money, or, in other words, a depreciation of all commodities and of labor.

There is a gradual shrinkage everywhere, and the merchant who to-day purchases a bill of goods does not know to-morrow at what price he can sell them; and if he has six months within which to pay for the goods, he does not know if at the end of that time he will not be a bankrupt because of the depreciation of property and shrinkage of the currency. And so it is, Mr. Speaker, with the manufacturer; so it is with the farmer; and so it is with every business man. He cannot enter upon business of any kind or embark in any business enterprise because he knows that the volume of money is contracting and prices falling from day to day. He cannot afford to buy to-day, for next week's falling prices will leave him with his property or goods on hand, and worth much less than he paid for them. For the same reason a manufacturer cannot operate, for the wares he makes will not bring cost in a falling market. The shrinkage of money always brings falling prices and sudden panic.

And that is what you are invited to by this bill or banking system, unless you mean to say that you are going to perpetuate the public debt. That is the condition you must face, and you cannot escape it.

Why not look at the facts as they really are; and if we do not mean to perpetuate the national debt, then we must devise another system to take the place of the national-bank system, whether it be a better system or a worse one. That is a situation we cannot escape. We cannot postpone it, because contraction will go on continuously from time to time, from month to month, or from year to year, as we pay the debt. And the idea of the Secretary of the Treasury that while

*The six years during which the advance of those three millions of promissory notes carried no interest having expired in the year 1806, it was proposed to the bank by the minister of the day that, instead of the notes being then repaid or returned to the bank, the advance of them should be continued by the bank to the public until the end of the war; the public, which had converted all the notes of the bank into state paper money, and had excused and prohibited the bank from the payment of them until the end of the war, paying interest to the bank for the same during the war at 3 per cent., or at the rate of £90,000 per annum.

It is needless, of course, to say that the bank agreed to the proposal, (although the directors had the modesty to qualify their consent to it with conditions;) for it is manifest that the effect of the arrangement was that from the year 1806 until the end of the late war, and thereafter until the resumption of its payments by the bank in the year 1822, a period of sixteen years, the corporation received back annually, under the name of interest, £90,000 a year of those three millions of notes—from the payment of which they were excused by the public—to be canceled.

And thus, instead of paying anything for the renewal of the charter in 1800 for thirty-three years, the bank actually received, at the public expense, no less than £90,000 a year from 1806 to 1822 for having accepted it!

If any beggar could have purchased a charter for the loan of three millions of his promissory notes, which he was excused and even prohibited from paying by the borrower, how would that beggar be enriched if for the continuance of such a loan he were for sixteen years to receive back annually, under the name of interest, £90,000 of his notes to be canceled, and payment in full of the three millions, over and above, in coin or money of the realm at the end of that period?

Yet such and no other was the bargain which the corporation of the bank had the dexterity to drive, the minister of the day the folly to consent to, and Parliament the want of sagacity to confirm, on the renewal of the charter of the bank in the year 1800.

Ninety thousand pounds a year, accumulated at compound interest of 5 per cent., which rate of interest could be obtained during all the period from 1806 to 1822, amounts to more than two millions; that is the sum, therefore, which the bank took by the bargain of the year 1800 for the renewal of its charter, in addition to all the other enormous advantages and exclusive privileges thereby secured to it.—Theory of Money. London: 1844. Pages 188, 189, § 6.

the contraction of the paper currency of banks is going on he will recommend that we shall also demonetize silver and further contract the currency is certainly not serious.

The gentleman from Maine a moment ago spoke with reference to the bill introduced here for the purpose or upon the subject of silver certificates, and I did not understand him to say what the policy of the bill was, but I understood what the report of that committee or the recommendation that it has made is. I have stated that the object is to do away with silver dollars and silver certificates. If I am mistaken in that I would like to be corrected by the gentleman.

Mr. DINGLEY. I said that the bill did not demonetize the silver dollar, but limited the coinage to the actual demands of the people for circulation.

Mr. BLAND. I understand, then, Mr. Speaker, what it is, and the country will understand it. It is simply to demonetize silver and have it coined in such quantities as the national banks shall determine. That is what it is. Why, we had just as well abandon the idea of Congress regulating the question of coinage, weights, and measures entirely. We have just as much right to turn over to the national-bank agents the duty of coining money and regulating its value as we have to give them the right to issue Government paper and set a value upon it. If we are going to abandon our duty to supply the people of the country with currency; if Congress is going to abandon its duty under the Constitution of the United States, and refuse to exercise its functions in furnishing money to this Government, either paper or coin, let us turn it all over to the banks. If they say demonetize silver, we obey. If they should say gold must go, it will have to go. Let the banks do the business for us. The theory is that the banks are our agents, but the truth is we are agents of the banks What they demand a subservient Congress obeys. They asked through the Secretary of the Treasury that the further issue of silver and silver certificates be stopped. The Secretary has made the recommendation to that effect. The bill is for that purpose. The Secretary says in his annual report that we should stop issuing silver and let the banks supply the money. The Banking Committee comply with the recommendation.

That is what it means. It is a demand of the national banks that silver shall be demonetized. And we may just as well let them do that thing without asking us to become cat's-paws for them; we may as well turn over the whole subject to their discretion, and let them go on with it.

Sir, in the days of Benton, in 1834, when this same subject was up, rechartering the National Bank, the national banks were very much opposed to his proposition to so amend the coinage laws as to induce gold as well as silver to flow to this country to take the place of bank notes. They denounced gold then as they do silver now. They ridiculed gold and ridiculed Benton. And because we to-day seek to bring silver back to where it was before its demonetization, because we desire coin in this Government that is contemplated in the Constitution, these same institutions that denounced gold in Benton's days are denouncing silver now, and denouncing those who favor it as silver humbugs as they called him a gold humbug. This proposition is intended to accommodate them. They would demonetize gold to-day if it was necessary to do so in order that their paper should circulate. For the purpose of supplying the vacuum that would be occasioned by withdrawing the coinage of silver and silver certificates for the purpose of supplying that vacuum with bank paper they ask this Congress to stop the coinage of silver and the issue of silver certificates. And that is the sort of legislation that we are asked from year to year to enact in order to accommodate national banks.

Mr. Speaker, while upon this silver question I desire to submit a few reflections in reference to it. In the first place, a few days ago Congress abandoned its duty in reference to the tariff and turned that over to a commission. We are asked now to abandon our duty in reference to the state paper of the Government and turn that over to a banking commission. We have been asked heretofore with reference to silver to stop coinage and turn that over to another commission to meet with foreign governments and ask their aid. When we talk of bills regulating railroad corporations there must be a commission for that also. When it is sought to perpetuate these enormities and iniquities and to increase the power of these vast corporations that have grown up here, they are afraid to trust the representatives of the people and ask us to turn over everything to commissions to be controlled by them. No, Mr. Speaker, we want no commission to meet with foreign governments on this silver question. It is simply cowardice to talk of sending agents to foreign governments to ask them to restore silver to circulation as money. As the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] just now remarks to me, it is worse than that; it is corruption. And why? You take Great Britain, France, and other European countries, and their production of silver is simply nothing. You take the American continent, and here is the production of that metal. In the United States one-half of the annual supply of the silver of the world is produced. There were in the year 1879 about eighty millions of dollars' worth of silver produced in the civilized world, and forty millions of that were produced in our own country. That being our product, we ought to protect it, because the Constitution requires us to do so, by making money of it. We produce one-half of the silver produced in the civilized world to-day, and yet we are too cowardly to take hold of our own product and establish its value in the market. We must go to nations who produce nothing of it; we must ask their co-operation to rehabilitate it!

Why, Mr. Speaker, all this is the demand of the national banks. It does not come from the great mass of the people of this country. Not at all. When the Senate struck from the bill we passed in this House the unlimited coinage feature of the silver bill it infracted every principle of monetary science. It was that act that depreciated silver. And why? Because it laid an embargo upon it. It said to gold, "You can come into the mints and the Treasury, and go free in and out every door; you are here recognized; you are here honored." But it said to silver, "You can come to the mints in limited quantities only; and if you come in greater quantities than that we will barricade the doors and shut you out; we will go into the market to depreciate you and purchase you at cheap rates." And worse than that, it violated the very theory of metallic money.

What is the idea of metallic money? The theory upon which metallic money is based is simply this: that gold and silver, being produced in limited quantities, by consent of mankind have become money, and that if both are taken to the mint free, given unlimited coinage, you may charge something for the coinage; that is not the question; but it shall be coined unlimitedly; and thus nature supplies the demand for money. That is to say, all the jurisdiction Congress has over the coining of gold and silver is to declare the relation existing between the two as to value, to declare what shall constitute a dollar in silver and a dollar in gold, and open the mint to both. When it has done that its functions cease. I do not pretend to say it is even necessary to declare it to be legal tender, for I believe it to be so under the Constitution. Usually we authorize its circulation, we declare it to be a legal tender, and there we stop. Nature, through the labor of mankind, in his industries in opening mines, in carrying on trade, supplies the volume of money more regularly than does the legislation of Congress when applied to the regulation of paper money.

Nature will supply these metals to this nation and to all nations alike; and hence the volume of money will be steady; it will not be contracted to-day and expended to-morrow for the purpose of enriching a few at the expense of the great mass of the people. It will come in in a steady volume, so to speak. You will have all the stock which has been dug from the mines for centuries back, and all the product of the future to draw from, which has been relied upon and upon which contracts have been based heretofore. Hence it becomes a national and an international money, and is supplied to all peoples alike.

When you do away with that argument, you knock from under it the foundation upon which it rests. And when Congress undertakes to say that it will regulate the volume of metallic money by demonetizing gold or demonetizing silver, or by limiting the coinage, it infringes every principle of metallic money and does violence to all true monetary theories. You may as well go upon a paper basis and do away with the monetary metals entirely.

When you throw open the mints to the gold and silver of the world then you will have a parity between the metals in this country and in all countries. We are able to maintain it ourselves without the aid of foreign governments. They are not able further to demonetize silver. On the contrary, the last monetary conference showed that they had gone as far in that direction as it was possible for them to go, and a little further than it was safe to go.

I say, then, that this nation, with its vast extent of territory, reaching as it does from the Atlantic to the Pacific and from the lakes to the Gulf, with its fifty millions of busy people handling and transacting all kinds of business, with a population increasing by immigration at the rate of a half a million annually, this great nation is able to utilize our own product of the precious metals without asking the permission of foreign governments.

Hence I denounce as a crime the attempted demonetization of silver or its limited coinage as embraced in that bill. I denounce it as a swindle; I denounce it here upon this floor as being in the interest of the banks and other corporations in this country and against the interests of the people; I denounce it as a species of robbery which ought to be kicked out of this legislative hall, and I hope will be, and the authors left at home the next election.

I mean no disrespect to the gentlemen of the committee who have reported the bill. I may have said a little too much in making that statement; but I will admonish them of one thing: they must answer for this before the people of the country.

If silver and gold had been in circulation in 1873; if we had then been on a coin basis as we are now, and the proposition had then been made to demonetize one or the other of these metals, the people would have understood what it meant, and the proposition would have been denounced from one end of the Union to the other. It never could have been accomplished.

And now that the people of the country have silver in circulation, although in limited quantities, you never can take it from them until the national banks shall step into the Hall of this House and into the other end of the Capitol, and, by threatening panics and otherwise, induce the representatives of the people to obey their behests and their will.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa.) The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLAND. If I could have ten or fifteen minutes more I would like it.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. I regret the necessity for me to object.

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HARDENBERGH] said he would yield fifteen minutes of his time to the gentleman.

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. I am next on the list, and I will yield five minutes of my time to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri can proceed for five minutes longer.

Mr. BLAND. I understood that I was to have fifteen minutes of the time of the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. HARDENBERGH,] as a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency, said he would yield fifteen minutes of his time to the gentleman from Missouri.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New Jersey has not yet been recognized.

Mr. HARDENBERGH. I yielded ten minutes of my time to the gentleman; I am entitled to an hour.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair cannot recognize the gentleman from New Jersey now for that purpose. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SMITH,] who yields five minutes of his time to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. REAGAN. There has been a sort of courtesy extended in every debate of interest on this floor. This is the first time I have seen any deliberate effort to choke down that courtesy.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I move that the gentleman be allowed to proceed at pleasure.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That requires unanimous consent, and objection is made.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I did not understand that objection was made.

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. The gentleman from Missouri asked for five minutes more and I yielded that time to him.

Mr. BLAND. I did not state five minutes.

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. BLAND. I stated that I would like ten or fifteen minutes more.

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. I will yield to the gentleman ten minutes of my time.

Mr. BLAND. I thank the gentleman. I have spoken with reference to these national banks as they existed during the war and as they must continue to exist if they are perpetuated. I have also referred to the fact that there are propositions pending here now looking to the extinguishment of these banks and the substitution of another system of currency.

We have this paper money now. It is no use for gentlemen to talk about paper-mills, for we have a paper-mill in one of your finest buildings, situated on the banks of the Potomac. The mill is there continually issuing bank paper at the expense of the people, I might say, except what is paid by the banks for their circulation. There is your paper-mill; it has already issued your paper money. All that my bill proposes in lieu of this is to stop the issue of paper money at what it is and continue it at its present volume; that is to say, to substitute Treasury notes for the amount of national-bank notes now outstanding. For it is supposed (and the Department seems to so state) that the volume of bank notes now outstanding is as great as it will ever be, and in fact greater. Stop the operations of your paper-mill at this point and issue your Treasury notes instead of bank notes. That is all there is in this proposition. Then let gold and silver come into the mints of this country free, and issue, if you please, your gold certificates and silver certificates to supply whatever demand there may be hereafter for paper. The laws of supply and demand will bring gold and silver to us to supply the increased demand for currency hereafter. Thus you have a system that is safe—safer than the present one, because the volume of the credit paper currency will be fixed and cannot be contracted or expanded, and the supply hereafter must come upon a coin basis. If that is not a better system than your national banking system, I know nothing of the theories of money.

Now, Mr. Speaker, why not adopt this system? Even if you do not allow the unlimited coinage of silver—if you maintain the present limit—you will have an increased volume of $2,000,000 per month, which will come in to supplement the Treasury notes outstanding. We shall thus have a credit paper circulation fixed in amount, not to be diminished or increased; and we shall have the metals to draw upon to supply any extraordinary demand.

The bill I introduce is as follows:

A bill to retire the circulation of national banks, and to continue them as banks of discount and deposit.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That any national banking association organized under the acts of February 25, 1863; June 3, 1864, and February 14, 1880; or under sections 5133, 5134, 5135, 5136, and 5154 of the Revised Statutes of the United States may, at any time within two years previous to the date of the expiration of its corporate existence under present law, and with the approval of the Comptroller of the Currency, to be granted as hereinafter provided, extend its period of succession, by amending its articles of association, for a term of not more than twenty years from the expiration of the period of succession named in said articles of association, and shall have succession for such extended period, unless sooner dissolved by the act of shareholders owning two-thirds of its stock, or unless its franchise becomes forfeited by some violation of law.

SEC. 2. That such amendment of such articles of association shall be authorized by the consent in writing of shareholders owning not less than two-thirds of the capital stock of the association; and the board of directors shall cause such consent to be certified over the seal of the association, by its president or cashier, to the Comptroller of the Currency, accompanied by an application made by the president or cashier for the approval of the amended articles of association by the Comptroller; and such amended articles of association shall not be valid until the Comptroller shall give to such association a certificate under his hand and seal that the association has complied with all the provisions required to be complied with, and is authorized to have succession for the extended period named in the amended articles of association.

SEC. 3. That upon the receipt of the application and certificate of the association provided for in the preceding section, the Comptroller of the Currency may, if he deems it necessary, cause a special examination to be made, at the expense of the association, to determine its condition; and if after such examination or otherwise it appears to him that said association is in a satisfactory condition, he shall grant his certificate of approval provided for in the preceding section, or if it appears that the condition of said association is not satisfactory, he shall withhold such certificate of approval.

SEC. 4. That any association so extending the period of its succession shall continue to enjoy all the rights and privileges and immunities granted and shall continue to be subject to all the duties, liabilities, and restrictions imposed by the Revised Statutes of the United States and other acts having reference to national banking associations, and it shall continue to be in all respects the identical association it was before the extension of its period of succession, with the same rights, immunities, and liabilities: Provided, That said associations are hereby prohibited from issuing circulating notes, and hereafter no national banking association shall increase its circulation or be organized with authority to issue notes to circulate as money.

SEC. 5. That when any national banking association has amended its articles of association as provided in this act, and the Comptroller has granted his certificate of approval, any shareholder not assenting to such amendment may give notice in writing to the directors, within thirty days from the date of the certificate of approval, of his desire to withdraw from said association, in which case he shall be entitled to receive from said banking association the value of the shares so held by him, to be ascertained by an appraisal made by a committee of three persons, one to be selected by such shareholder, one by the directors, and the third by the first two; and in case the value so fixed shall not be satisfactory to any such shareholder he may appeal to the Comptroller of the Currency, who shall cause a reappraisal to be made, which shall be final and binding; and if said reappraisal shall exceed the value fixed by said committee the bank shall pay the expenses of said reappraisal, and otherwise the appellant shall pay said expenses; and the value so ascertained and determined shall be deemed to be a debt due to said shareholder from said bank until paid; and the shares so surrendered and appraised shall, after due notice, be sold at public sale, within thirty days after the final appraisal provided in this section.

SEC. 6. That national banking associations that may be continued by this act, and those whose corporate existence shall expire, shall be required to comply with the provisions of sections 5221 and 5222 of the Revised Statutes in the same manner as if the shareholders had voted to go into liquidation, as provided in section 5220 of the Revised Statutes; and the provisions of section 5224 not inconsistent herewith shall also be applicable to such associations.

SEC. 7. That all the moneys deposited in the Treasury of the United States for the purpose of redeeming the circulation of national banking associations shall be deemed surplus revenues, and used in the payment of the current expenditures of the Government, and in the extinguishment of the interest-bearing debt of the United States, in the same manner as other surplus revenues are authorized to be expended.

SEC. 8. That for the purpose of retiring and canceling the notes of national banking associations surrendering their circulation the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause to be printed and engraved Treasury notes of the United States, of the denominations of five, ten, twenty, fifty, one hundred, and one thousand dollars, bearing such inscriptions and devices as he may approve, to be exchanged for the bank notes above described on presentation of the same at the Treasury; and the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause to be issued said Treasury notes in lieu of such bank notes as shall become the property of the Government in payment of taxes or otherwise; and that the bank notes for which Treasury notes shall be substituted shall be destroyed.

SEC. 9. That the Treasury notes issued in pursuance of this act shall be receivable and payable for all dues and demands for which national-bank notes are now by law receivable and payable, and shall be exchangeable for legal-tender notes when presented, in sums of one hundred dollars or more, for that purpose at the Treasury of the United States, but when so exchanged shall be paid out of the Treasury again as other current funds; and that said Treasury notes shall be redeemable at the pleasure of the United States, in legal-tender notes or coin, at the option of the Government.

SEC. 10. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall make such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry any of the provisions of this act into effect.

This is the system we propose. It is the system advocated by Jefferson. I want to speak here to-day as a Democrat. From the beginning of this Government there have been two opposing theories, one represented by Hamilton, the other by Jefferson. Hamilton represented the idea of an aristocratic government; he advocated national banks. Jefferson represented a Republican form of government; he did not favor national banks. The Democratic party in all its history never established a national bank, while it has always been in favor of the free, unlimited coinage of gold and silver. The Democratic party never oppressed the people of this land by legislation for the creation or extension of banking corporations. It has never built up institutions of this sort, but has always done what it could to put them down. In the days of Benton this war was waged; and now to-day, nearly one hundred years from the formation of the Government, we meet the same issues and the same doctrines that prevailed at that time; divided parties at that time.

We are called upon to-day to defend on this floor the doctrine that ours is a Government of limited powers, against centralization of power in the Federal Government. Wealthy corporations seek to centralize power for their own aggrandizement. This idea of centralization is dangerous to the interests of the masses of the people. Centralization may protect wealth, but it destroys liberty. Following Jefferson and the teachings of the Democratic party, I am opposed to building up corporations in this country upon theories of centralized government. The same ideas that distinguished the Federalists from the Republican party nearly one hundred years ago distinguish the two existing parties at the present day. I am glad to know that the Democrats as a party, with very few exceptions on this floor, will oppose the committee bill; and this simply shows that history repeats itself; that principles live eternally, although men may die.

Mr. Speaker, I have said that this national banking system must go out of existence, and that it is the duty of this Congress to institute some other system. When the time comes for the consideration of this bill in Committee of the Whole, I trust that such amendments will be placed upon the bill of the gentleman from Massachusetts as will carry out that idea. Let us wind up these institutions. Let us require them, as their charters expire, to redeem their circulation by depositing lawful money in the Treasury; and let this lawful money be used in redeeming the bonds of the Government. In this manner we can pay off the public debt and get rid of a national menace.

Thanking the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SMITH,] who has kindly yielded me a part of his time, I surrender the floor.

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] desires five minutes to answer a few points made by the last speaker, [Mr BLAND,] and I yield to him for that purpose.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, as the gentleman from Missouri who has just taken his seat has made certain representations in reference to a bill reported by a majority of the Committee on Banking and Currency in relation to the coinage of the silver dollar, I deem it proper at this time to correct his statements. If I understood him correctly he represented that the national banks, through a majority of the Banking and Currency Committee, had contrived a bill to demonetize the standard silver dollar and to take away from the people that dollar. Am I correct?

Mr. BLAND. Does the gentleman ask me the question?

Mr. DINGLEY. I do.

Mr. BLAND. I have shown that the demand for the demonetization of silver comes from the national-bank interest.

Mr. DINGLEY. I am correct, then.

Mr. BLAND. Let me continue my statement.

Mr. DINGLEY. There is no necessity for repeating it. I wish to show, without taking up more than two minutes of time, that the bill reported by the majority of the Committee on Banking and Currency with reference to the coinage of the silver dollar simply provides that coinage shall be limited to the demands of the people. Its sole purpose is to prevent the accumulation of silver dollars in the Treasury which the people do not want. And allow me, in this connection, to give some facts bearing on that subject——

Mr. BLAND. Allow me, there. In my argument I showed the demands of the people should control; that the coinage of the silver dollar should be in accordance with the wishes of the people.

Mr. DINGLEY. Precisely.

Mr. BLAND. But under the proposition brought forward on the other side, who is to judge of the demands of the people? You are to issue these as the people shall demand them. Judged by whom? Judged by the national banks, the Comptroller of the Currency, and the Secretary of the Treasury, and not by Congress.

Mr. DINGLEY. I agree with the gentleman that it is the people who should determine the amount of coinage of the silver dollar, and they will indicate their wants by the demand they make for them at the Treasury. Now, what has been the demand of the people for the silver dollar? On the 1st day of January there were in circulation 35,758,043 silver dollars. Since that time we have coined 9,183,700, and have paid out over half of them, and over half of those paid out have come back to the Treasury and accumulated there.

More than that, Mr. Speaker. Of the $35,758,043 that were in circulation on the 1st day of January, $3,455,969 have also been returned to the Treasury and are there to-day. Thus we have accumulated in the Treasury since the 1st day of January 12,639,669 silver dollars that the people do not want. The people do not demand them, and the people not wanting them, the Committee on Banking and Currency say only those should be coined that the people want.

Mr. BLAND. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. DINGLEY. Certainly.

Mr. BLAND. Now, Mr. Speaker, with all due deference to the gentleman from Maine, I suppose he would not demonetize gold for the same reason that he proposes now to demonetize silver. Now the Secretary of the Treasury says that he will not issue gold certificates. Why? Because all the gold in the country would be locked up in the Treasury.

Mr. DINGLEY. I do not want the gentleman to make a speech.

Mr. BLAND. I am not making a speech. I am merely saying for the same reason the gentleman would not propose to demonetize gold certificates. There would then be no gold in the country, if gold certificates were issued, because it would all be locked up in the Treasury.

Mr. DINGLEY. There is no law authorizing the issue of silver certificates for gold.

Mr. BLAND. Oh, no.

Mr. DINGLEY. There is a law authorizing the issue of gold certificates on deposit of gold. [Mr. BLAND rose.] I do not yield. Allow me further to say in this connection there are $3,406,750 less of silver certificates in circulation to-day than there were on the 1st day of January. So, practically, by silver coinage and the issuing of silver certificates, we have accumulated in the Treasury since the 1st day of January 16,046,419 silver dollars and silver certificates which the people do not want. And the Committee on Banking and Currency simply say we should coin no more than the people desire.

Mr. BLAND. The gentleman from Maine evidently did not understand my question. Will he yield for a question?

Mr. DINGLEY. I will for a question, but not for a speech.

Mr. BLAND. It is this: Will the gentleman state why the Secretary of the Treasury will not now issue certificates for gold?

Mr. DINGLEY. My own judgment is on that subject——

Mr. BLAND. I ask the gentleman to read the Secretary's report.

Mr. DINGLEY. I cannot answer for the Secretary.

Mr. BLAND. I will answer by referring the gentleman to his report.

Mr. DINGLEY. I understand that.

Mr. BLAND. If you understand that, then you know that he says that he will not issue them because all the gold in the country would be locked up by certificates going out therefor, and that all the gold would be there in the Treasury and there would be none left for redemption purposes.

Mr. DINGLEY. I cannot yield further.

Mr. BLAND. By this plan gold will be locked up just the same as silver.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time yielded to the gentleman from Maine has expired.

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I occupy a somewhat peculiar position in regard to the matter now under consideration. As a private banker, coming in competition daily in my business with the national bank of our city, it will seem somewhat remarkable to members of this House that I should be an advocate of the continuance of the national banking system, and yet that is the case. Having been in the banking business for quite a number of years, having observed the operation of the national banking system, I am firmly convinced that the best interests of the people of this country will be subserved by the continuation of that system. Being convinced that the interests of the people will thereby best be subserved, I am in favor of a bill which will facilitate the reorganization, or rather the extension, of the national-bank charters when they expire.

The first reason for this that occurs to me is that it will keep in the channels of trade a great deal of money now in the banks to be reorganized, which if they go into liquidation will seek investment elsewhere. The amount of that money which composes the surplus funds of the banks is $184,000,000, according to the report of the Comptroller of the Currency. If you compel the present corporations to liquidate their liabilities to stockholders and depositors, all this surplus will be scattered and go into other enterprises—and that is a large sum. Whereas if these charters are renewed, as is proposed by this bill, the bulk of that money may be retained by these banks for the uses to which it is now applied. This to my mind is one strong argument why the facility proposed to be extended by this bill to these banks should be granted under their organizations as they now exist.

There have been objections urged upon this floor against this bill because parties making them were in favor of the distribution of this surplus fund to the stockholders. This bill provides that in case there is a dispute, the stockholder who wishes to retire from the national banking system, and withdraw his interest, shall be justly treated. That his stock and its value—its market value—shall be appraised by three persons, one to be appointed by himself, one by the bank, and those two to choose a third, who shall say what is the value of his stock, and that value the bank must pay; and if the bank refuses to pay its value, it further provides that he shall have an appeal to the Comptroller of the Currency, who shall appoint some person with authority to make a final decision. The committee, therefore, have aimed to do justice to the stockholders of the national banks, and no one would be aggrieved by the passage of this bill.

One more point before I leave the stockholders. There are many individuals representing trust funds who have invested that money in the stock of national banks, and have regarded it as the safest and best investment possible, as well as the most profitable to the widows and orphans of the estates they represent. Has it ever occurred to gentlemen in this House that much of the money now invested in this manner in the national-bank stocks (money held by these parties in trust) would be seeking other investment, and such trustees would not be again able, under the law, to purchase new stock in other corporations and thereby be compelled to do great injury to the trusts they hold if we do not pass this bill? To many holders of national-bank stock which is now well invested and a profitable source of income this would be a hardship.

Mr. BRUMM. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. BRUMM. I would like to ask the gentleman in the first place must not the present system be abolished or the public debt be perpetuated? And then I would like to ask him a question as to this trustee business to which he has referred.

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. In answer to the gentleman's question I will reply, not at all. The Comptroller of the Currency advises us that as long as there are $150,000,000 of Government bonds in existence the present national banking system can be maintained with its present circulation.

Mr. BUCKNER. Not with its present circulation.

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. I should have said, with the least possible circulation under existing laws.

Mr. BRUMM. Then you must contemplate the existence of a public debt to that extent.

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. Not at all. I am in favor of maintaining the national banking system even if they lose every dollar of their circulation.

Mr. BRUMM. Now, in reference to this issuing business, that being the main object of the bill——

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. I beg the gentleman's pardon; it says nothing about the issuing business.

Mr. BRUMM. Does not this bill expressly refer to the right of the national banks to issue their money? It does not say deposits on demand or exchanges; if so, I would like the gentleman to point it out.

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. The gentleman must certainly know that the national banking system does not derive its great benefits from the fact that it is allowed a currency. That is the least, as has been so ably shown by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

What is it that makes the national banking system profitable? It is that it commands the confidence of the people and thereby commands their deposits; and it is upon these deposits that they make their millions and millions of money, and not upon the circulation as furnished them by the national Government.

Mr. BRUMM. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRUMM. Is the gentleman willing to vote for a bill that will retain to the national banks every function that they now possess except the issuing function?

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. That question is not before us now.

Mr. BRUMM. I am asking you now, will you vote for such a bill?

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. I think when the time comes when we shall have sufficient specie in the United States upon which to base our currency, that the national-bank bills may be retired. I am in favor of maintaining the national banks now and paying off the national debt as rapidly as possible. If they are compelled gradually and slowly to retire their circulation, well and good; this fact does not frighten me, and for this reason: we are increasing, or have during the last three or four years increased, our circulation to such a large extent by the importation of gold and the production of silver that we have mined, upon which we have issued those silver certificates, which I think are the best circulation we have—a great deal better than your national-bank bills or your greenbacks, because every one of them represents so much specie on hand. By the increase of those silver certificates, if our prosperity continues and the balance of trade should continue to be in our favor, we could gradually dispense with the circulation of the national banks; and this threat of the retirement of the national-bank currency has no terror for me.

Mr. BRUMM. That is all I want to know.

Mr. DINGLEY. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. BURROWS, of Missouri. I desire also to ask a question.

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. Certainly; I am willing to listen to any questions that may be put to me.

Mr. DINGLEY. I wish to make a suggestion at this point, whether it is not a little premature to predicate legislation with respect to the currency upon an extinguished national debt when it is fifteen hundred millions to-day and seven hundred and thirty-nine millions of it do not become due for twenty-five years.

Mr. BRUMM. Does the gentleman from Maine wish me to answer him?

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. I will answer him. I think that discussion would be premature now, as the discussion between my friend from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] on the silver question was entirely premature.

Mr. BRUMM. Their questions and answers are birds of a feather. The answer is, with proper legislation we need not have any fifteen hundred millions of debt or anything like it.

Mr. BURROWS, of Missouri. The question I wish to ask the gentleman from Illinois is this: he seems very much in favor of silver certificates, and so am I. I would like him to account for the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury in recommending that sixty-six millions of silver certificates be retired.

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. I do not agree with the Secretary of the Treasury in that?

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. That is honest.

Mr. PAYSON. It is a good answer and a short one.

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. Well, to continue my remarks, according to the report of the Comptroller of the Treasury, which I hold in my hand, the charters of three hundred and ninety-three national banks will expire before another Congress could take action upon this matter. Therefore if we are friendly to the national banks—of course it is all based upon that—if this Congress is friendly to the national banks we should pass this bill now, in order that these three hundred and ninety-three banks, whose charters expire before February of next year, may have the opportunity of extending their charters under this act which we propose to pass. I wish to touch upon a few of the reasons why I think the national banking system should be continued.

Mr. BUCKNER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question right here?

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. BUCKNER. Has the gentleman the means of stating to the House what proportion of the bonds held by these three hundred and ninety-three banks are in the 3½ percents?

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. I have it not at my command at this moment, but the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BUCKNER] has it, and he will be able to give it when he makes his speech. If these banks have not sufficient bonds of the 3½ percents they will have to purchase 4 percents and 4½ percents when the others are called.

Mr. BUCKNER. Suppose they have not the 4 and 4½ percents.

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. They can go into the market and purchase them if they are anxious to keep their circulation. But I do not think they will be very anxious to keep their circulation.

Mr. BUCKNER. I will give the figures. There are seventy-five millions of bonds which are held to secure the sixty-nine millions of circulation of these banks, only fifty millions of which are 3½ per. cent. bonds. Supposing those banks holding these fifty millions have no other security than the 3½ percents, what becomes of their circulation unless they are willing to buy 4 and 4½ percents?

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. I think I should answer that question. When we come to Congress next winter, when the gentleman from Missouri will be here and when I shall be here, we can pass a law allowing the unlimited coinage of silver in order to replace the circulation which may have been retired; and I shall favor that when the time comes. The probability is, however, that these banks which will lose this circulation, or rather whose bonds will be called by the Secretary of the Treasury, will go into the markets and purchase 4 or 4½ percents which have many years to run, provided they desire to keep their circulation. There is not, let me say, such a great disposition on the part of the national banks to secure as much circulation as possible. What are the facts in that connection?

It is not very profitable to the national banks to have this circulation. If that is conceded, then what becomes of this great outcry, over which my friend from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] grows hoarse in speaking, about the great iniquity inflicted upon the people of the United States, who he says are compelled to pay interest on these bonds in order that these monopolists may have the privilege of issuing the circulating medium for the people?

Now, the facts are these, gentlemen, and you are as well aware of it as I am, that the national banks newly organized, more particularly in the West, take out as little circulation as possible.

Only a few days ago, when I was on my return here from a visit home, I was seated by the side of the cashier of a national bank, and I asked him in regard to this bill. He said that they had organized a $50,000 bank some time ago, and had taken out just $27,000 of circulation, because they did not want more; it did not pay.

Then it will be asked why do men go into the national banking business? It is because the people believe it has the protection and supervision of the United States Government. It commends itself to the people because the Government appoints men to investigate the affairs of these banks, because they must make under oath their quarterly reports. In this way the people in the various localities can see how their moneys are managed under the national banking system.

Right here, in that connection, I would say that I think the investigation of the national banks should be more thorough and more strict. I hope gentlemen in this House will make that point in their speeches, and call the attention of the Comptroller of the Currency to the fact that a better supervision of the national banks is possible, as has been shown by the failure of some prominent institutions by which the people have lost large sums of money.

Yet this is a remarkable fact that although there are now twenty-two hundred national banks and over, and although there have been twenty-five hundred national banks organized, in all these years only eighty-six of them have gone into forced liquidation. And the depositors, not the stockholders, but the depositors, the people, have received from these eighty-six national banks over 76 per cent. of all the money they had deposited in them.

There never has been such a banking system in the world for safety, for security to the people, as the national banking system of this country. It should therefore be maintained, and it will be maintained, notwithstanding the prediction of my friend from Missouri, [Mr. BLAND,] who sounded the death-knell of every member of Congress who should go before the people with a vote in favor of continuing these national banks.

I want to state to the gentleman that I made that very issue upon the stump when I ran for Congress, and I defeated a Greenback Democrat who was opposed to national banks. I made the issue fairly and squarely, holding the Republican party responsible for their existence and advocating their continuation as being for the best interest of the people. Upon that issue I defeated my opponent. If there ever was a financial institution that commended itself to the people, it is the national banking system of the United States. No Republican need hesitate to defend it. It commends itself to the confidence of the people, and if it is fairly represented the people will sustain every man who advocates its continuance.

One objection that is made to the national banks, and it is the one that is most often made, is that they cost the Government or the people too much. That objection was repeated by my friend from Missouri, [Mr. BLAND;] but he does not show by the figures how much it costs the people of the United States. I challenge him to show the figures of the cost to the people of the United States of maintaining the national banks.

Mr. BLAND. As the gentleman challenges me, I will tell him that it costs $12,000,000 annually.

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. How do you figure that out?

Mr. BLAND. I figure it out this way: if the national banks were required to redeem their circulation, the Government could then redeem a sufficient amount of bonds to save $12,000,000 annually. The Government giving these banks that amount of circulation to use for their benefit, denies that to the people. And it costs $12,000,000 to continue the bonds that could be redeemed, if the national-bank circulation were required to be redeemed.

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. That is with an "if."

Mr. BLAND. Not at all.

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. The gentleman starts out on his proposition with an "if."

Mr. BLAND. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. What is the difference between the interest paid by the United States and the taxes paid by the banks to the Government? That is, the cost that the Government must bear.

Mr. BLAND. The interest that these banks pay on their circulation hardly pays for the expense of keeping it up.

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. They pay 1 per cent. on their circulation.

Mr. BLAND. And that just about pays the expense of the circulation.

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. Oh, no.

Mr. HUTCHINS. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. With pleasure.

Mr. HUTCHINS. Is the gentleman aware of the amount of taxes paid by the national banks? Take those in the city of New York, for instance; they have paid as high as 3 per cent. a year, and this year they are taxed nearly 2.60 per cent., so that they pay into the city treasury of New York something like $1,700,000 a year in taxes.

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. I am aware of that fact.

Mr. BLAND. The State banks would pay taxes on their circulation.

Mr. HUTCHINS. Is it understood on the part of those who would issue Treasury notes or greenbacks that they are to be taxed?

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. I thank the gentleman for the figures he has given me. I will supplement them by saying that as the national banks must publish the amount of their capital stock and their deposits they are thus subjected to local taxation as are no other institutions in the United States.

Mr. HUTCHINS. Is it not a fact that the national banks, so far as the gentleman knows, are the only institutions in the country that pay tax on the full value of their capital?

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. In my experience as a banker I have seen a national bank with a capital of $100,000 crowded to the wall by municipal taxation, because the assessor in that locality chose to assess the capital stock at its full value, while the neighbors of that bank paid taxation under the laws of the State upon a valuation of only one-third.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I would like to ask my colleague whether he knows of any national bank that has ever been taxed upon its reserve fund?

Mr. DINGLEY. I do.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I know of some national banks that have a larger reserve fund than their capital, and yet they escape taxation upon the reserve fund.

Mr. RAY. In New Hampshire every dollar of the surplus is taxed.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I do not know a single national bank in Illinois that has ever paid a cent of taxation upon its reserve, and I know of no bank in New York City, although I have some knowledge of several national banks there, that has ever paid any taxation whatever upon its surplus.

Mr. FLOWER. The Gallatin National Bank is taxed by the State and city upon its stock at a valuation of 145, making an aggregate taxation of $36,975, while a 4 per cent. bond purchased now and deposited would yield less than 3 per cent., and that the average rate of interest on the bonds now held by the bank is 3.7 per cent., or $37,000 interest on the million.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Does that bank pay a tax on its surplus?

Mr. HUTCHINS. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. It is the first case of the kind I have heard of.

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. The surplus fund of a bank in my State is taxed equally with its capital. Under the laws of Illinois the assessor, if he understands his business, can and will always require a bank to pay its full share of taxation. By our law as now amended the capital of national banks is only to be assessed as other property is; and that is just.

Mr. BUCKNER. Does not the gentleman from Illinois know that during the last year, notwithstanding all this local and national taxation under which these banks are supposed to be groaning, the national banks throughout the country have paid upon the average 9 per cent. dividend to their stockholders?

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. That is right, Mr. Speaker. That speaks well for the prosperity of our country. I have no complaint to make about national banks realizing for their stockholders 9 per cent. when other branches of industry yield quite as much. Why should we object because the national banks make a fair profit?

Mr. DINGLEY. I would like to correct the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BUCKNER] at this point. When he speaks about the national banks making dividends of 9 per cent. on the average, does he not understand that the local taxation is to be deducted, so that the average net profit is 2 per cent. less?

Mr. BUCKNER. I can only state that the report of the Comptroller of the Currency shows that the dividends of these banks last year averaged 9 per cent. after the payment of all taxes.

Mr. DINGLEY. Not the local taxation. The shareholder pays the local taxation after the dividend is paid.

Mr. HUTCHINS. And in some cases the local taxation is 5 per cent.

Mr. DINGLEY. It is 5 per cent. in some cases. In my State it averages 2 per cent.

Mr. RAY. In the State of New Hampshire the lowest rate of taxation of bank stock is the par value of the stock. If the market value is higher, then it goes into the assessment roll at its market value, and is taxed accordingly. The surplus also is taxed by law, the same as other money at interest.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I wish to ask my colleague [Mr. SMITH] whether in Illinois the individual shareholder is assessed upon the amount of the stock he holds in a national bank? Is not the tax collected through the bank? Is it not paid by the cashier?

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. Yes, sir.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Then, my friend from New York is mistaken——

Mr. FLOWER. If the gentleman from Illinois will read the decision made last year by Judge Brady he will find that the stock of national banks is subject to municipal and State taxation to the full amount of its market value.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. But I understand that the individual stockholder does not pay the tax upon his stock directly; that the tax is collected through the bank.

Mr. DINGLEY. Not at all.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. My colleague, who is a banker, can answer that question.

Mr. DINGLEY. When the Comptroller of the Currency states that the profits of the national banks last year averaged 9 per cent., he deducts, in reaching that result, the national taxes only, not local taxation.

Mr. BUCKNER. He does not say so.

Mr. DINGLEY. That is the fact.

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I have been very patient with my friends during these interruptions, because by colloquy the points of a question like this are often better brought out than by lengthy speeches. I solicit inquiry; and whenever I make a statement, if any member believes it incorrect I wish him to rise and so state. I want to be fair about this matter. I believe it is the interest of all the people of the United States that the national banking system should be continued. Therefore, I favored this bill in committee and support it now.

I now turn to a topic which has been much talked about on the stump and in the Halls of Congress. What profit do the national banks realize upon this privilege of issuing circulation? The gentleman from Massachusetts has fully set forth the facts, but it will do no harm to repeat them. Here is a table. In Illinois, where the rate of interest is 8 per cent., the profit to national banks, whose currency is based on 3½ per cent. bonds, is 1.28 per cent.

The people of the United States, for the privilege of having the national banking system for the State of Illinois, pay 1.28 per cent., which is the entire cost to the people of the United States of the national-bank circulation, leaving out of the calculation the advantages which accrue to the people by municipal taxation.

There is one other point I wish to call to the attention of this House, and that is the advantage to the Government of the United States of the national banks as fiscal agents. Have you thought of it, that the millions and millions of dollars of revenue paid by the people of the United States are handled by this national banking system, through its depositaries, without a cent of cost to the Government of the United States? What would be the cost if you had the State-bank system? Do you suppose the State banks would accommodate themselves to the interest of the national Government, handle all this money and transfer all these exchanges without cost? It is because the national banking system is under the supervision of the United States Government that these facilities are offered to the officers of the Government without cost to the people. And that amounts to a far greater sum if you would figure the exchanges that would have to be paid if they did it through private banks. As a question between the private banks and the national banks, do you not suppose those private banks would charge the Government for doing this work?

And, more than that, these national banks offer as security the deposit of national bonds; that is to secure the deposits which are made with them as fiscal agents of the Government. So that the Government of the United States is perfectly safe every night when its revenues are paid into the vaults of these national banks distributed all over the territory of the United States. Every dollar of that is secured beforehand by the bonds deposited in the Treasury at Washington. You must not keep that out of view, because I think it is an important fact when we consider the cost of the national banks to the people of the United States.

There is one remark made by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] which might mislead. He said, What is the national-bank note other than a state paper? I understood what he meant, but the impression might be made by that remark that the national-bank note is no better than the State notes we had before the war. It is based on the credit of the United States Government, upon the national bonds, and upon the national credit. [Mr. BLAND rose.] I understood the gentleman and will do him justice.

Mr. BLAND. I do not wish the gentleman to make a false impression. I have no idea that a State-bank note is better than a Treasury note issued by the Government.

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, the experience of the people of the United States with that "wild-cat money" is not yet forgotten. The fathers teach it to their sons that they also may profit by the lesson that it inculcates. They speak of the "bob-tail," "rag-tag," and "red-dog" currency, or whatever other name that currency had in other days, and they point with pride to the national-bank currency and the "greenback" currency as such a valuable substitute for that other which was based upon the credit of the States.

Now, I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the opposition to the national banking system lies in the fact that there are still many gentlemen on this floor who believe that the States should furnish the basis of circulation. I think the experience of the people will never again allow the States to furnish the basis of circulation.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Who are they?

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. I say that I have the impression many of them do.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Does my friend know of any?

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. I should think perhaps the gentleman from Mississippi, where national banks are scarce.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I am not in favor of State or national banks.

Mr. DINGLEY. Were not five bills repealing the 10 per cent. tax on State-bank circulation introduced during the last Congress?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I was not aware of it.

Mr. DINGLEY. That is all that stands in the way of the resuscitation of the State banks.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. The opposition on this side is to all banks of issue. We believe we can issue Treasury notes as good in every respect as national-bank notes.

Mr. DINGLEY. But there are some gentlemen yet in favor of the State banks.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. They are very few in number.

Mr. BRUMM. The only one I know of is one gentleman on the Committee on Banking and Currency, who, I believe, is in favor of this bill, hoping through this we may ultimately get down to the State banks. I refer to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FLOWER. Does the gentleman allude to me?

Mr. BRUMM. Yes, sir; the only gentleman I know of in favor of State banks.

Mr. FLOWER. The gentleman misquotes me.

Mr. BRUMM. Then I beg the gentleman's pardon. I certainly have misunderstood him.

Mr. FLOWER. It would not perhaps be safe to say that no banker in this country would like to go back to the State-bank system, because he made 6 per cent. on his own mortgages and 6 or 7 per cent. on his currency under the old safety-fund system of the State of New York; and certainly no banker would object to that, because he could make more by that system than by this.

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. I have promised, Mr. Speaker, to yield a part of my time, and therefore I will hurry through with my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. THOMPSON, of Iowa, in the chair.) The gentleman has five minutes remaining.

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. I believe that the time will soon come when the national banks will be willing to voluntarily surrender their circulation. Now, as I have before stated, they have reduced the amounts to the minimum allowed by law. I think that if Congress by judicious legislation will hedge the system about, and let them understand that it shall be maintained for all future time, this circulation may be surrendered as rapidly as the bonds may be paid off, which I hope may be very soon.

We learn by the experience of the people of England that we should base our circulation upon gold and silver in the hands or the vaults of the Government. I suppose all gentlemen here know that the Bank of England issues about fifteen million pounds of circulation upon a credit, and that all the rest of the circulation is based dollar for dollar on the amount of specie in the vaults of the bank. If our prosperity continues, as I said before, I believe the time is not very far distant when we can also bank as the Bank of England does today, which is the proper way; and it will prevent panics and prevent people from rushing to the banks to realize upon their notes in gold and silver. Let us shape our legislation to that end, that we may make it safe for the people to intrust their money and funds now in hand to the care and keeping of the banks.

I now yield the remainder of my time, if I have any, to the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. DOWD.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has exhausted his time.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, if the friends of the pending measure intend any real and substantial benefit to thenational banks, they certainly expect to give their intentions definite shape in some way not developed in this bill, for the passage of this alone can be but an empty boon to the banks. It certainly will if it becomes a law give the right to the banks to extend their existence, but it just as certainly does not provide any means for such extension. The public debt, without which the national banks cannot exist for one hour, is being reduced at a rapidly accelerating rate, and, unless some radical change is made in the present management of the financial affairs of the nation, but a very short time can elapse until all that class of bonds upon which the national banking system now rests for support will be numbered among "the things that were."

For one I do not believe that all there is of this bill appears upon its face, but I do believe it to be a part of a persistent antagonism to the coinage of silver and the issue of silver certificates, that has characterized the executive administration of this Government every day of its existence since President Hayes, in his veto message of February 28, 1878, assured the country that "the right to pay duties in silver or in certificates for silver deposits will, when they are issued in sufficient amounts to circulate, put an end to the receipt of revenue in gold."

I believe it is a part of an irrepressible conflict between the national banks on one hand and silver and silver certificates on the other, or, I might more correctly say, between the national banks on one hand and all other forms of money except gold on the other.

This effort to restrict the money of the country to gold and bank notes took its first decisive step in 1873 in the demonetization of silver, which was quickly followed by the act of 1874, styled "An act to provide for the resumption of specie payments," under which taking title there was comfortably tucked away a provision to absolutely destroy the greenback money of the country. Both these steps were promptly repudiated by the people, and I have no doubt that this step will be as promptly and emphatically rebuked at the elections next fall.

The principal reason given by the Committee on Banking and Currency for the passage of this bill is, as I understand it, a fear of a reduction in the volume of paper money if it should fail to become a law; and on this subject the committee use the following language in their report accompanying this bill:

> In forming a judgment of the wisdom of the proposed legislation extending the corporate existence of national banks, it is proper to consider what effect the failure of Congress to act will have upon the paper circulation of the country. In the absence of any authority to continue their business, within the next twelve months three hundred and ninty-three banks must go into liquidation. This will compel the withdrawal of $69,160,980 of lawful money now in active circulation in order to procure $75,768,700 United States bonds lodged with the Comptroller and which the liquidating banks will withdraw for sale and for the purpose of closing their affairs and making division of their assets.
> Upon one single day, February 25, 1883, the charters of two hundred and ninety-seven banks will expire, involving a return to the Treasury of $54,000,000 of lawful money. It is not difficult to conjecture the influence of such a contraction of the currency upon the business of the country and the values of property.

I believe that any such reduction of the volume of paper money would be unwise and perhaps disastrous to the business interests of the country. But is there any real necessity for this reduction even if this bill should fail to become a law? I for one think there is none, and that the supply of paper currency can be kept up to the present volume more profitably to the Government and the people by almost any other means than the plan proposed by the committee.

The substitute for this bill offered by the distinguished gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BUCKNER,] as well as a bill recently introduced by his colleague, [Mr. BLAND,] providing for the issue of Treasury notes in lieu of bank notes as rapidly as the bank notes may be retired, offers a simple, safe, and absolutely certain means of preventing any contraction of the paper currency.

These bills have each been before the House for some time, their merits are apparent, and they need no discussion by me; but I desire at this time to call the attention of the House to another means of supplying paper currency, which, if we may judge the future by the past, would, if adopted, in twelve months' time give to the country a volume of paper money equal to that of the bank notes likely to be retired within that time under the law as it now stands, but which proposition, I greatly fear, will not meet the approval of those who antagonize the coinage of silver in the interests of national banks.

On the 10th day of last month I had the honor to introduce into this House the following bill:

> A bill to provide for the exchange of silver coin and silver certificates for gold coin and gold bullion.
> Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That any person may deposit gold coin or gold bullion, in sums of not less than $10, with the Treasurer or any assistant treasurer of the United States, and shall receive therefor silver coin, or silver certificates of not less than $10 each and corresponding with the denominations of United States notes, at the counter of any United States assistant treasurer designated by the depositor.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to constitute any superintendent of a mint or assayer of any assay office an assistant treasurer of the United States, without additional compensation, for the purposes of this act.

This bill was referred to a committee, and judging that committee by what appears to be the disposition of a majority of this House, I fear it may remain there too long to be of practical benefit in the solution of this question; but as the Committee on Banking and Currency, and possibly a majority of this House, seem to be exercised by an apprehension of a contraction of paper money, I desire to call their attention to this means of averting that calamity. To understand clearly the object proposed by this bill, the reasons for its introduction, and how it would operate to relieve the country from any apprehension of the contraction of the currency, and therefore from the supposed necessity to pass this bill, I beg leave to call the attention of the House to the fact that on the 18th day of September, 1880, Hon. JOHN SHERMAN, then Secretary of the Treasury, issued a Department circular as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, SECRETARY'S OFFICE
Washington, D. C., September 18, 1880.

Until further notice the United States assistant treasurer at New York will pay out at his counter standard silver dollars or silver certificates in sums of $10, or any multiples thereof, in exchange for like amounts of gold coin or gold bullion deposited with him.

Upon the receipt by the Treasurer of the United States in this city of an original certificate of deposit issued by the United States assistant treasurer at New York, stating that there has been deposited with him gold coin or gold bullion in the sum of $10, or any multiple thereof, payment of a like amount in standard silver dollars or silver certificates at the counter of any United States assistant treasurer designated by the depositor will be ordered.

JOHN SHERMAN, Secretary.

Of this circular the above bill is almost an exact copy, only differing from it in not confining its operation to New York.

A few days over one month from the date of this circular Hon. James Gilfillan, Treasurer of the United States, in his regular annual report to the Secretary of the Treasury, under date of November 1, 1880, on the subject of silver certificates used the following language:

The demand for silver certificates, under the circular of the Department, dated September 18, 1880, authorizing their exchange for gold coin or bullion, has been quite extensive at New Orleans, Saint Louis, Chicago, and Cincinnati, and there were paid out at these points during the month of October $3,485,000 in silver certificates for an equal amount of gold coin deposited in the sub-treasury at New York.

This statement of the Treasurer that $3,485,000 of gold had been voluntarily exchanged dollar for dollar for silver certificates within one month seems to be somewhat striking when we remember that Congress and the country have been told year after year since the passage of the silver-coinage act, by the Presidents and by the Secretaries of the Treasury, with what almost insurmountable difficulties they have been beset in getting silver into circulation.

We find, however, on page 10 of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, made to this House at this session, the following still more striking statement:

The Department has issued silver certificates at the several sub-treasury offices, upon a deposit of gold coin in like amount with the assistant treasurer at New York, and through this means certificates have been issued for nearly all the silver held by the Treasury. These certificates amount to about sixty-six million dollars, and are now outstanding.

A voluntary exchange of sixty-six millions dollars of gold coin for silver certificates, dollar for dollar, being five and one half millions per month on an average for twelve months' time, and this too for gold deposited under the terms of the circular at but one point—the city of New York—no other city being allowed the same privilege of giving gold for silver certificates. On page 421 of the same report the Treasurer of the United States says that "the effect of these operations, so far as the Treasury is concerned, is to convert its silver dollars into gold, for the issue of silver certificates transfers the ownership of the silver dollars, which they represent, from the Treasury to the public."

This report of the transactions under the operation of this circular would seem to have been so advantageous to the Government and so entirely satisfactory to the public as to lead one to suppose that they would be continued indefinitely and become perhaps a permanent feature in the financial management of the Government; but unfortunately it seems that no sort of success with silver or silver certificates can ever have the effect of teaching the banks or Bourbon Republicans anything favorable to silver.

These advantages, however, resulting from the exchange of silver certificates for gold, great as they seem, are not by any means all that have resulted from this exchange, as will very distinctly appear by considering the following further statement taken from the same page (421) of the Treasurer's report:

[Comparing the condition of the Treasury September 30, 1881, with its condition on the same day last year, the most striking changes are the increase in the gold coin and bullion and standard silver dollar on hand and in the silver certificates outstanding. Deducting the gold certificates actually outstanding, the gold belonging to the Government on September 30 of the last four years was $112,602,622.20 in 1878; $154,987,371.29 in 1879; $128,160,085.77 in 1880; and $169,552,746.41 in 1881. In 1880 the gold ran down nearly $27,000,000, but this decrease was much more than overcome in 1881, when it increased more than $41,000,000, reaching the highest point ever attained. This increase was largely due to the sale for gold coin in New York under the circular of September 18, 1880, of exchange on the West and South, payable in silver certificates.

And this is stated as a result of the issue of these identical certificates which President Hayes said would stop the collection of revenue in gold, and the continued issue of which we are now assured will "tend to reduce us to a place in the commercial world among the minor and less civilized nations."

And again the Treasurer says:

The gross amount of gold and silver coin and bullion held by the Treasury, without regard to the obligations outstanding against it, has ranged from $163,969,444.70, in 1878, to $222,807,368.01 in 1879, $214,303,215.38 in 1880, and $269,706,998.76 in 1881. The increase within the last year has been $55,400,000, of which $39,150,000 is in the gold and $16,250,000 in the silver. The increase in the gold has been greater and in the silver less in the last year than in any year since the coinage of the standard silver dollar began.

And last year is the year in which the Government has been willing to exchange silver certificates for gold. Notwithstanding that, under the operation of this circular, sixty-six millions of silver dollars in the Treasury had been converted into gold; and notwithstanding the fact that sixty-six millions of dollars had been added to the paper currency of the country by this means, and in utter disregard of the fact that the sale of silver certificates for gold coin in New York alone under this circular had resulted in the "most striking increase" of "gold coin and standard silver dollars in the Treasury of the United States," on the 1st day of November, 1881, the Acting Secretary of the Treasury suspended the issue of silver certificates in exchange for gold by issuing Department Circular No. 108, as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, SECRETARY'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., November 1, 1881.

Until further notice the exchange of silver certificates for gold coin deposited at the office of the United States assistant treasurer at New York will be suspended, and Department's Circular No. 75, of September 18, 1880, is hereby modified accordingly.

H. F. FRENCH, Acting Secretary.

The great advantages resulting to the Government, as shown by the official reports above quoted, certainly would not have been abandoned without reason. I am aware that it may be said, in justification of this suspension, that on the 1st day of November, 1881, about all the silver dollars in the Treasury of the United States were covered by the outstanding certificates; but if the officers of the Government had been as anxious to continue this exchange as a man of ordinary prudence would have been, in the management of his own private affairs, it would readily have occurred to them that without any change in the law they had the power to coin four millions of silver dollars per month, instead of restricting it, as they now do and have done from the beginning, to about the smallest amount possible under the law.

Whatever the intention may have been, the effect of all this is simple and clear. The commercial and business habits of this country demand a paper circulation. If silver certificates could be stricken out of existence it would put us in an attitude to be told by the friends of the national banks that we must extend their charters or take the consequences of such a contraction of the currency as would seriously disturb the business of the country.

Whether such was the purpose, of course I know not; but I do know that on page 10 of his report to the present Congress the honorable Secretary of the Treasury says in discussing this very question:

There need be no apprehension of a too limited paper circulation. The national banks are ready to issue their notes in such quantity as the laws of trade demand, and as security therefor the Government will hold an equivalent in its own bonds.

Yet, Mr. Speaker, the very able committee of this House who report this bill for our consideration and adoption tell this House and the country, in effect, that these banks will not issue the money demanded by the laws of trade except upon the passage by this body of certain laws which many of us believe to be antagonistic to the best interests of the country.

This refusal on the part of the officers of the Government to exchange silver certificates for gold is, however, by no means the whole of the effort to arrest the circulation of these certificates. The honorable Secretary of the Treasury, on the same page of his report, recommends the absolute suspension of their issue, and if the power had been lodged in his hands there is no doubt that instead of simply stopping their exchange for gold he would have absolutely destroyed them. He says:

The embarrassments which are certain to follow from the endeavor to maintain several standards of value, in the form of paper currency, are too obvious to need discussion.

It is recommended therefore, that measures be taken for a repeal of the act requiring the issue of such certificates, and the early retirement of them from circulation.

And this suggestion is adopted by a committee of this House, and a bill reported to carry these views into effect.

If the Secretary is right, and we must choose between these two forms of paper money, I, for one, am ready now and here to accept that paper, every dollar of which represents an actual dollar, coined and deposited in the strong box of the nation, guarded and protected by a nation's honor and the patriotism of fifty millions of loyal hearts, in preference to a paper promise of a corporation which rests upon that greatest of modern evils—a national debt.

But the crowning act of what seems to me to be a strangely suicidal policy on the part of the Government in attempting to strike down its own currency and to build up that of private corporations is in the following declaration taken from the same page, (x,) report of the Secretary of the Treasury:

As is said elsewhere herein, the circulation of some sixty-six millions of silver certificates seems an inexpedient addition to the paper currency. They are made a legal tender for the purposes named, yet have for their basis about 88 per cent only of their nominal value. There is no promise from the Government to make good the difference between their actual and nominal value.

There is a popular opinion that those who own the gold of this country understand its value and are not likely to part with it, except upon receiving a full equivalent; they are even suspected in some quarters of being at times willing by hard bargains to take more than its real worth, if the necessities of trade make it possible to do so. This may be all a delusion, but yet the opinion exists. Whether this is true or not, I ask, in the name of common sense, why the holders of gold are willing, and were willing all through last year, to exchange on an average five and a half millions of dollars per month of that precious metal for silver certificates if there existed in the markets of the country or in the minds of men the slightest opinion that these certificates were not worth fully as much as gold?

Does not the honorable Secretary's own official report conclusively show that he has attempted to strike down and degrade "a standard of value, in the form of paper money," issued by his own Government, and which he as its chief financial officer should have felt himself bound to support and protect? The Committee on Banking and Currency in a recent report says: "We cannot change the unwritten laws of value by any statute;" and I will say that we cannot change the unwritten laws of value by any mere declaration of a Secretary of the Treasury.

One of the features of the national banking system with which its admirers seem to be greatly in love is its "elasticity," the readiness with which it is capable of adapting the volume of currency to the demands of business. But this to the minds of others seems to be a monster evil. Corporations are selfish; if not more so than natural persons, they are certainly fully as much so. In the very nature of things they can have none of that feeling of personal accountability which men must always feel to a greater or less degree. This is recognized in the old expression familiarly applied to corporations, that "they have no bodies to be kicked nor souls to be damned."

If this power to contract and inflate the currency at will—this power, as they term it, of adapting the supply to the demands of trade—is left unrestrained and uncontrolled in their hands, they will of course inflate and contract the volume of paper money as their own interests may dictate, utterly regardless of the interests of other persons, corporations, or the general public. Why then should they be intrusted with the exercise of a power which might make or unmake fortunes in a day, and which might be disastrous to all the business interests of the country?

When the Constitution of the United States intrusts the power to "coin money" to the General Government, and denies that right in terms to sovereign States, and also denies them the right to "emit bills of credit," by what argument in law or reason can the right to exercise this power of sovereignty be claimed for corporations organized for merely private purposes? And with what show of reason can the Congress of the United States be asked to extend the charters of these institutions, when we are assured be the Committee on Banking and Currency that "the necessity which called the banks into existence has ceased to exist?"

We are to-day solemnly called upon by the friends of this bill to provide against a possible reduction of the paper currency, by operation of law, within the next year, by the sum of about sixty-nine millions of dollars, while they propose to leave the power in the hands of the banks to reduce it hundreds of millions, if they choose to do so. They offer the country no guard or protection against such a calamity, except the unrestrained will of the banks.

If the House is desirous of avoiding the evil pointed out by the committee, and at the same time this greater evil which must be apparent to all, a prompt passage of the substitute of Mr. BUCKNER or of Mr. BLAND will reach the object sought. This course will save the country from any possible danger of a repetition of the conduct of the banks in March of last year, and will render the business of the country absolutely secure from the possibility of a reduction of our money; and I cannot conceive how we can hesitate for one moment under the circumstances. We certainly are not willing to hazard the great business interests of this country, in our haste to be slavishly subservient to the supposed wishes of the national banks.

There was a time in the history of our Government when perhaps the extraordinary demands of a great war made a resort to methods of doubtful constitutionality a necessity. Such a necessity called the national banks into existence for the purpose of creating a market for the bonds of the Government. They, at a safe distance from the battle-field, performed that duty and doubtless did it well, and right royally have they been rewarded for it.

The profit of almost six hundred millions of dollars since 1870—to say nothing of the advantage derived from the increased value of their bonds—is certainly ample compensation for all their toil and danger, much more ample than has been accorded to "the boys who wore the blue," and day after day risked their lives on fields of blood and death while the bankers, in elegant offices and at a safe distance from the "ragged and rebellious" sons of the "sunny South," risked a part of their profits on the issue.

The inseparable connection between the banks and the national debt, however, is enough of itself to terminate the system as at present organized; for no more exact truth has ever been spoken than was uttered by Judge BUCKNER a few days ago upon this floor when he said:

There is no more universal sentiment in this country than the fixed and determined purpose to discharge the last dollar of the public interest-bearing debt as rapidly as the resources of the country will permit.

This debt has hung like a pall over this country ever since the war, and has been a weight upon its business energies almost unendurable. The people without regard to party now see the beginning of the end, and nothing will stay them or turn them aside from this great purpose to free themselves from this incubus.

The last monthly statement of the public debt made by the Secretary of the Treasury shows that in ten months, ending May 1, 1882, the debt had been decreased $128,748,213.37, and with the last month, April, 1882, it was reduced $14,415,823.74; and I believe any administration, whether Republican or Democratic, that dares to thwart this purpose of prompt payment of the debt would be hurled from power.

The payment of interest is at best a sort of slavery. The man who collects it has that much property in the man who pays it, and the people think that having paid over two thousand millions of dollars as interest alone upon that great debt, it is time that the whole should be paid off and this ceaseless drain be forever stopped.

The men of the North are no more willing that they and their children shall be bondmen than they were that the colored people should be bondmen in the South, and the men of the South are unwilling to exchange one slavery for another. The minds of the men who constitute the bone and sinew of this country are made up, they see; that but a short time is now necessary to pay off the bonds, and they are determined they, like that other slavery, like polygamy, like the Chinese, "must go," and go they will.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the remainder of my time.

JAMES Q. SMITH, CONTESTANT, DECEASED.

Mr. OATES. At the instance of my colleagues in this House, as well as the Senators from my State, I ask unanimous consent at this time to introduce a resolution for immediate consideration. I make the request at this time because of the necessity for prompt action.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Representatives be, and is hereby, directed to pay out of the contingent fund of the House the funeral expenses of James Q. Smith, late a contestant for a seat in the House of Representatives from the fourth district of Alabama, said sum to be deducted from any allowance to be made for the expenses of such contest.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. OATES moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EXTENSION OF NATIONAL-BANK CHARTERS.

Mr. DOWD. Mr. Speaker, it is important in the consideration and discussion of any subject upon which we are about to legislate to understand precisely what the question is. I am well aware that debates upon this floor do frequently take a very wide range, and that "speaking for Buncombe" is quite in order upon almost any occasion. But when we have to consider such intensely practical and matter-of-fact questions as banks and money, whatever we may choose to talk about, we should at least thoroughly understand the real issue that is raised by the proposed legislation. I am constrained to make these observations because it seems to me that some of our friends who oppose the bill now pending before the House do not rightly comprehend its provisions or its object. All the speeches I have heard and all the newspaper articles and circulars I have read in opposition to this measure assume or seem to suppose that the issue raised is as to the merits or imperfections of the national banking system, and that the defeat of this bill is to be the death of these banks.

I do not so understand it, Mr. Speaker. I undertake to say no such issue is presented. The national banking system is not now upon trial before this House. The question is not whether that is a good or a bad system, nor whether it shall be continued for a definite or an indefinite period; nor will it be affected, in my opinion, very materially by the fate of this bill. Certain banks will be affected, and the public interest may be affected; but the vitality and perpetuity of the national banking system will not, so far as I can see, be influenced to any considerable extent. The provisions of the bill apply only to existing banks as they approach the limitation of their corporate existence, granting them a new lease of life with precisely the same organization and the same powers for good or evil which they at present possess. No member of this House has attempted to show, and I presume no one will attempt to show, that the failure to pass this bill would necessarily reduce the number of national banks or permanently diminish the amount of their note circulation or even deprive them of what has been called their "vast power of contingent mischief." If it could be shown that such would be the effect of the bill the opposition to it could be understood. It would then have point and force.

These banks whose charters are soon to expire are not going out of existence unless they find it to their interest to do so. If their business is prospering and the outlook is good they will renew their charters in the way provided by law now upon the statute-book. The process is very simple. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BUCKNER] understands this perfectly well. From his very able speech on this subject, delivered on the 17th of April last, I quote as follows:

> The system was designed to be self-perpetuating, while the individual bank is limited in the duration of its corporate life. * * * The owners and stockholders can organize a new bank with the same assets, as has already been done by banks in Michigan and Iowa.

Now, if these banks can prolong their existence by the simple process of a new organization by the same stockholders and with the same assets, as the gentleman from Missouri says they can, and as we all know they can, what good is to be accomplished by the defeat of this bill?

Mr. BLAND. May I answer the gentleman's inquiry?

Mr. DOWD. I will yield for a simple answer.

Mr. BLAND. They are compelled to redeem their circulation, and that money can be used of course to retire the bonds. We make the banks redeem their circulation, and that money can be used for the purpose I have stated.

Mr. FLOWER. Then you would pay them in Treasury notes?

Mr. BLAND. I would pay them as they are paid now. The gentleman from New York must understand that they are being paid off with the surplus revenues at the rate of a hundred millions a year——

Mr. DOWD. I must decline to yield to the gentleman to repeat the argument which he has already made two or three times.

Mr. HUTCHINS. And there is not a dollar of it paid in silver——

Mr. DOWD. I must decline to yield the floor for any discussion. I say it only provides an easy way for the banks to do what they can now do, but with some inconvenience and expense to themselves, and possibly great detriment to the public. Then, why defeat this bill and compel the reorganization of new banks? Would new banks, springing up out of the ashes of the old ones, organized under the same laws, with the same officers and stockholders, the same assets and identically the same "vast powers of contingent mischief" be any better than the old ones? The name would be changed, and perhaps nothing else, except the stationery, the letter-heads, checks, &c. Who would be benefited? Not the public, for here is the same business, conducted at the same place, by the same officers, under the same rules, regulations, and laws, with the same assets and the same facilities for mischief; not the stockholders, for their rights are fixed by law, under the contract of organization, and must remain unaffected by any future legislation; they can retire at the end of the bank's original corporate limit and withdraw their entire interest.

This is distinctly admitted in the speech from which I have already quoted and is plainly recognized and provided for in the fifth section of the bill. It has been asserted upon this floor that this legislation is not sought or desired by the banks, but that it originated in the interest of those who wish to perpetuate the national debt. Let me say, sir, that I utterly fail to see how the question of the payment of the public debt is at all involved in the matter now before this House. I assert emphatically, but with due deference to any who may hold other views, that the question of the reduction or payment of the public debt is wholly foreign to the scope and effect of this bill. And if any gentleman upon this floor will assert and attempt to prove the contrary, I will give him the closest attention and what he says the most careful consideration.

But who is to be benefited by passing this bill? The answer is, the banks whose charters are to expire from time to time, and also the public either directly or incidentally. The advantage to the banks will be that without embarrassment, without expense, without calling in their loans or contracting their circulation, their existence is continued. The surplus fund is the pride and ornament of every bank. It is accumulated to give security to the public and strength to the bank. Why, as if in a spirit of wantonness, will you compel them to scatter it to the winds or yourselves strike it down as with the hand of the iconoclast? To subject them and their customers and the public to all these inconveniences, by refusing to pass the bill, without any good to anybody or anything, would seem to be most unreasonable and unjust. I have said that all these institutions will not go out of existence; but doubtless many of them would not reorganize. In many parts of the country there is little or no profit in issuing circulation upon Government bonds at their present high market price and low rate of interest, and many banks have already surrendered a large portion of their circulation. If we fail to pass this bill, whether the banks whose charters are soon to expire shall reorganize or not, all their circulation will have to be called in.

To effect this an equivalent amount of legal-tender notes is required to be deposited with the United States Treasurer. The last annual report of the Comptroller of the Currency gives the information that between the 1st of the present month and the 25th of February, 1883, the number of banks whose charters will expire is three hundred and ninety-three, having an aggregate capital of nearly $92,000,000 and nearly $68,000,000 of circulation. So that within the next ten months, if these banks are required to wind up their business, or even change their names, the enormous sum of $68,000,000 of money now in circulation will have to be taken from the channels of business, and from the pockets of the people, and locked up in the vaults of the Treasury. Some gentlemen say, let Treasury notes be issued to replace this retiring bank circulation, and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] has introduced a substitute to this effect. But the Treasury note which he provides for is a rank and unmitigated specimen of "fiat money," representing nothing but the whims and caprices of politicians and the mutations and uncertainties of Congressional majorities.

Mr. BLAND. If the gentleman will explain the difference between the Treasury note and the national-bank note, he will answer his own argument.

Mr. DOWD. I understand the——

Mr. BLAND. A word more. They are exactly the same, except that one goes to the people and the other to the corporations.

Mr. DOWD. I understand the difference as shown by the gentleman's bill, that while the national-bank note is to be canceled the Treasury note is paid out again. So when a panic comes, and a man wants his gold, he takes his note to the Treasury and it is paid out again to another man, and then to another, and you have a constant stream of panic-stricken men following each other round and round in a continuous circle to get gold out of the Treasury.

Mr. BLAND. The same thing exists with the banks. They are not required to redeem in gold at all. They are both redeemable in Treasury notes; and the Government is behind both in the case I propose.

Mr. DOWD. There is a very great difference between destroying a note in case it should become depreciated, and paying it out to deceive and cheat somebody else with it afterward.

Mr. BLAND. Who will be cheated when the bank note depreciates?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from North Carolina yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. DOWD. Not any further. I think I have answered the gentleman's questions.

Unless I greatly misinterpret the sentiment of the American people, they do not want and will not tolerate any such a currency as that. Through much tribulation, through great affliction and suffering, privation and sorrow, and through a financial crash worse even than war they have reached a specie basis, and in my opinion will not easily be induced to depart from it. It is possible that the process of retiring and reissuing circulating notes by pulling down the old banks and putting up new ones in their places may be accomplished without serious detriment to the public. The country is in a condition of great prosperity, and its resources are truly marvelous. But is it wise or safe to make the experiment? We have had some rather recent experience in the matter of the contraction of the currency. Shall we have repeated in 1883 the calamities of 1873?

What right have we to involve the business men of the country, the toiling masses, whose welfare is so dear to the heart of the average politician, in such risks and experiments. We have now the opportunity to make certain amendments to the law upon this subject. I am heartily in favor of both the amendments suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] to wit:

First. To prohibit the banks from arbitrarily and suddenly retiring their circulation; and Second. To require them in certain cases to bring their suits in the State courts, and not compel defendants to travel hundreds of miles to attend the Federal courts.

These are highly important amendments, and I cannot doubt they will pass this House by a large majority. The power to contract the currency is a most vital one, and the power to contract at will to the extent now possessed by the banks is an extremely dangerous one.

The power of unlimited expansion is equally vital and dangerous. The one necessarily leads to the other, and individual and national bankruptcy is the inevitable result. We have already had a foretaste of this power of contraction as exhibited upon the occasion of the passage of the refunding bill. A demonstration was made by these institutions upon that occasion in the withdrawal of some eighteen millions of currency in a few hours that sent a thrill of anxiety and alarm to every business house in the land. The act was extremely reprehensible. It displayed a reckless disregard of the public welfare and a spirit that smacked of defiance and bravado. It made no new friends for the banks, but it called attention sharply to the extraordinary and dangerous powers lodged in their hands.

The second section of the bill recently passed by the Senate and which is offered as an amendment to the bill now before this House is as follows:

> Any national banking association, now organized or hereafter organized, desiring to withdraw its circulating notes * * * shall be required to give thirty days' notice to the Comptroller of the Currency of its intention to deposit lawful money and withdraw its circulating notes: Provided, Not more than five millions of dollars of lawful money shall be deposited during any calendar month for this purpose.

It has been said by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BUCKNER] that "whether we have a contraction of the currency to the extent of one million or fifty millions in the early part of next year depends wholly upon what each one of these banks considers to be its interest." And in reply it may be said that whether such dangerous power is to continue to reside in the hands of these institutions depends upon the manner in which we perform our duties in this House and upon this occasion.

Mr. BUCKNER. I wish to ask my friend from North Carolina what does he propose to do, in consideration of granting them an extension of their powers for the next twenty years, to prevent their refusing to go on by the payment of their bonds—suppose their bonds are called in?

Mr. DOWD. I have stated I am in favor of the provision incorporated in the Senate bill; and that is to prevent them retiring their circulation suddenly, requiring them to give certain notice before they retire.

Mr. BUCKNER. That does not accomplish anything.

Mr. DOWD. Well, you cannot prevent them from taking up their circulation. They can do that now if they choose. If this amendment is incorporated they cannot take up their notes except so many a month, and the process will be so slow it cannot materially affect the body of the circulation.

Mr. BUCKNER. That is in the case of a voluntary change of their bonds; but here is a case when they are called, namely, the 3½ per cent. bonds, which are now held as the foundation of the circulation.

Mr. DOWD. I do not suppose the Government is going to call them in such a way as to bring on a panic or defeat the purposes of this bill. The Government will be bound by the proviso of the Senate bill above quoted.

Mr. BLAND. That is, the debt will be continued to accommodate the banks.

Mr. DOWD. Oh, no; as has already been stated on this floor, there is more of the public debt in these bonds not to mature for twenty-five years than the banks now hold.

The national banking system has many objectionable features. It was born of the exigencies of war and financial distress, and is not best suited to a condition of peace and national prosperity. Still we find it in existence, a potent fact which we cannot ignore. Among all its opponents there is not one to say we can afford to abolish it at present. All are agreed that it must continue to exist to some period in the future. Being founded and sustained upon the public indebtedness, the way to get rid of it is to pay the debt. And that is about the only way it will ever be done. Unfriendly legislation, indiscriminate warfare will not do it; for with all their imperfections and faults it must be admitted they have many friends and advocates among the people. With their vested rights under existing laws and the firm hold they have upon public confidence by reason of the high order of security they afford to the bill-holder, the stockholder, and the depositor, they will prove a formidable adversary to any attacking force, and the individual or party who would lead the assault might do well to reckon carefully his hosts and husband well his resources.

Mr. BRUMM. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him one question?

Mr. DOWD. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRUMM. The gentleman from North Carolina says the only way to get rid of these banks is by payment of the debt. He acknowledges that the time is coming when the debt will be paid. Now, then, the question is, when the debt is paid, what does the gentleman propose to substitute for the present national-bank notes, in the light of the assertion made some time ago that they are better than the Treasury notes by reason of their not being destroyed?

Mr. DOWD. In the light of the statement that has already been made, that it would be some twenty-five years before the payment of the public debt, I beg to be excused from giving any opinion as to what would then be best to be done. But I will state to the gentleman who raised the question just now about State banks that I have something to say on that subject presently, to which I will invite his careful attention.

Mr. BLAND. How many banks does the gentleman think will exist after the 3½ per cent. bonds have been paid, which will probably be within the next three years? And how is he to meet the enormous contraction of the currency that will be caused by this bill?

Mr. DOWD. That has been answered several times in this discussion.

Mr. BLAND. Not at all.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from North Carolina yield?

Mr. DOWD. No, sir; I do not yield further at present.

But the banks can live only upon the public debt. And certain doctrines held chiefly upon this side of the House would seem to favor their perpetuity. Free trade—which, by the way, no one I believe has advocated upon this floor except my colleague, [Mr. ARMFIELD,] and he says he wants it as the Christian prays for the millennium to come after awhile but not right now—the abolition of tariff taxes and the repeal of the internal-revenue laws, would doubtless reduce the public resources to a limit that would not admit of further reduction of the national debt. It has been given out by our friends upon the other side that there is to be no material reduction of the internal-revenue taxes, and we all understand that the doctrines of free trade are not likely to prevail in this country for some time to come. So, while we may, let us set to work and by carefully handling our resources, and by due economy in public expenditures, get rid of the national debt and the national banks together.

I desire to say a few words as to what we are to substitute for national banks. I belong to that large class in and out of Congress who, while not favoring our system of national banks per se, yet think it would be unwise to abolish or cripple them till something better can be substituted in their place. We know that if the system has some bad features it has also some good ones. It affords a sound, reliable, and uniform currency. The banks are so organized and conducted as to engage public confidence in a very high degree all over the country. They lend money at as low rates of interest and do not make greater profits for their stockholders than other banking institutions in this and other countries. We want them replaced by something equally as good in all these respects. At the South we need more currency. Our exchanges are necessarily effected almost entirely by the use of cash. We cannot use checks and drafts to the same extent that they are used in the denser communities and large cities North. Besides, the income from our crops is largely expended in the Northern markets for merchandise, farming implements, groceries, &c., and as a consequence there is great scarcity of money in the summer months at the South, while there is at the same time a plethora in all the great commercial and manufacturing centers North. I know the reply to all this is, we should raise more of our own food supplies and build and operate factories for ourselves. But it requires money to build factories, and under existing circumstances it requires time and money to revolutionize our methods of farming. What we need is more money, cheaper money, lower rates of interest.

The Government borrows its hundreds of millions at 3½ per cent.; the citizen pays 10 to 15 per cent. The discrepancy is too great. If our people could borrow all the money they could prudently and safely use at 4 or 5, or even 6 per cent. per annum, there would be a rebound in their prosperity that would be without a parallel in all the past. There ought to be wisdom and patriotism enough in the halls of our National Legislature to devise some plan that would afford the needed relief, and enable our people in every locality to borrow what money they need at reasonable rates of interest. It is a subject worthy of the most earnest consideration of our wisest and best men; a subject of infinitely more importance to the masses of the people than the tariff and internal-revenue laws, about which we have heard so much upon this floor, day after day and week after week. It seems to me that what we need is a sound local currency to supplement our national currency; one that would be good at home, but might not go abroad except under difficulties. I do not believe the greenback plan will accomplish this object, because I see no way to prevent the greenback money any more than the bank notes from drifting periodically to the great trade centers.

I know there is much prejudice against the old State-bank system. It is flippantly styled chimerical, bogus, wildcat, and the like. But there was really great prosperity at the South in the days of the old State banks, and planters everywhere could borrow money at 6 per cent. Many considerations might be presented in favor of the re-establishment of these institutions. And they certainly will be re-established in some form as the national banks go out of existence, unless some preferable system is devised. I do not desire to advocate their re-establishment nor to express any convictions I may have on the subject, but only to submit for consideration some reflections touching a subject that in the not distant future will demand the attention of the American people and some action on the part of Congress. As we are to have the national banks for some time yet, why not allow competing banks to be established in the various localities over the country, in order that the people may have the benefit of the competition? If it is true that some of the old State banks were badly constituted and badly managed, it is also true that others of them were constructed upon a solid basis, were well managed, and that their bills were always worth a hundred cents in the dollar in gold.

Mr. BRUMM. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him another question in regard to this subject of the concentration of greenbacks at the centers?

Mr. DOWD. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRUMM. If a law should be passed compelling the banker, especially the New York City banker, to pay say 50 per cent. on the amount he allows on deposits, or preventing by act of Congress banks from depositing their money in other banks, would not that prevent the concentration of money in the money centers, whether it be greenbacks or any other kind of money?

Mr. DOWD. The question of the gentleman is so broad and so comprehensive or incomprehensible, and so very foreign to the scope of my argument or anything that is to be accomplished by the passage or the defeat of this bill, that he must excuse me now until I have more time to consider it.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I would say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania if we passed a law that no business at all be done by the banks then there would be no concentration of money in the banks.

Mr. DOWD. It was the war that broke the old banks, or most of them, though some even withstood the havoc and destruction of both war and reconstruction. So it is idle to say that State banks are necessarily unsafe and unreliable, or that they may not be brought up to a standard of absolute soundness and solvency. If the State Legislatures and people were somewhat careless about such matters in times of peace and prosperity, they would doubtless be warned and benefited by the sad experiences and lessons of the past. With national banks as a sort of standard and guide, State institutions founded or conducted upon even a questionable basis could not stand the frigid test of public confidence. Investors would not have their stock, and business people would not touch their bills. Every institution of the kind would be subjected to the severest ordeal of scrutiny and criticism. The public would be interested to know that they were safe and reliable, and the national banks, as rivals, would be on the alert to expose their defects and weaknesses.

I would also suggest to our Greenback friends and others opposed to the national system that the revival of State banks upon a judicious and conservative basis might greatly facilitate the displacement and retirement of the national banks. Such formidable competition might tend to drive them out of existence. There is every reason to believe that many of the national banks would be turned into State banks if the latter were allowed to issue circulation.

There might be other advantages in having a dual paper circulation. If the national currency is good in any part of the country, and the State money good only in the locality of the bank, this very fact might be the means of equalizing the circulation, supplying local demands, preventing the unwholesome accumulations at the large trade centers, and the corresponding scarcity at remote points. Even if a merchant or traveler should wish to take an amount of money upon his person, which is rarely the case in this age of checks and drafts, the State and national bank notes being equally good at home, he could evenly exchange the former for the latter.

Again, in the event of a crisis with either one of the two systems the other might stand as a support. With a single paper circulation, to be tampered with by every succeeding Congress, any injudicious or ill-considered act of legislation, or the unexpected decision of the courts upon the construction of some law, might convulse the whole country with panic and disaster. One locality could not afford relief to another, nor one individual to another. All would be affected alike. But with two systems coexisting the one might, in cases of emergency, act as a breakwater and protection to the other and to the public.

But there is to my mind an almost insuperable objection to State banks of issue, and that is the difficulty of properly circumscribing the limit to which they might swell the volume of circulation. Each State would, of course, have to prescribe a basis and limit for its own banks. How could the adjustment be made so that each State would authorize no more than its own proportion, with reference to the business of the whole country and the demands of the people at large?

Very much the same difficulty exists with reference to the United States Treasury notes and the national-bank notes. Who is to fix the limit of expansion? You answer, Congress. When, how, and where? The increase of the volume of circulation in this country for the last year was over one hundred and fifty millions, derived from new banks organized, the coinage of silver and gold, and the excess of importation of gold coin. Have we enough money in the country already? Have we too much? Where will you stop the increase, and how? It must be checked sooner or later, for inflation is as dangerous as contraction. Will you say the aggregate amount shall be so many dollars and no more?

Suppose, when you have done this, the balance of trade should turn against us, and our gold coin should begin to go out at the rate of a few millions a day or a week. What then? Will you fix the limit at so many dollars per capita? At how many dollars per head for every man, woman, and child? England and France are both accepted as models of national financiering, and yet the latter uses twice as much money per head as the former. The difference is accounted for by the fact that England, much more than France, utilizes banks and other economic methods of handling money and making exchanges. If the methods of transacting business and the extent of business transactions were the same everywhere according to population the per capita standard would be a good one. But it is not without its difficulties. It might be supposed to be a rigid standard, but it is not. It is exceedingly elastic. When you have adjusted the number of dollars to the number of heads you must not forget that contraction or expansion may take place by the increase or diminution of the number of heads as well as of the number of dollars. It is a doubly elastic standard.

Every theory of currency, the whole subject of money and national finance, is exceeding subtle and interesting. It has puzzled the wisest men in all ages; the more we study the less we seem to know. With the American people at this time it is not a mere theoretical question, but one intensely practical. It has direct relation to the material prosperity of the country, to all classes of business, and even to the very pockets of the people, and is of the very essence of the science of government. It has challenged and will challenge the highest ambition of the statesman, and the most earnest attention and study of the legislator and the man of business. [Applause.]

Mr. FLOWER. The bill before us, Mr. Speaker, is merely a measure to facilitate the rechartering of the national banks. It does not extend the time of their corporate existence any longer than they can extend it themselves. It facilitates the business of the country in certain particulars, which I think I showed very conclusively about two weeks ago. I think it stops, so far as it can stop, a contraction of the currency. And for those reasons, with a few amendments to the bill, I shall vote for it.

It is very fortunate, I think, that at this time we have the right to facilitate this recharter; that the legislation on the subject has been such that the banks have to come to us for relief. But the business interests of the country will be demoralized if the measure of relief stands in this shape without modification. And why? Because they demoralized the business interests of the country about a year ago by withdrawing eighteen millions of greenbacks from circulation.

Now, I think we ought to throw around the business interests of the country every necessary precaution by an amendment to this bill compelling the banks to give three months' notice before they retire any of their circulation—before they can pay in greenbacks and take out the bonds they have on deposit as security for their circulation and sell them. Else this banking system will become a machine, as it has been somewhat in the past, for speculating in Government bonds. These banks will take out circulation whenever it will pay them to do so, and when it will not they will refuse to take it out. As soon as bonds go up in value in would go the greenbacks for the bonds; and these banks would sell the bonds for the premium.

They should be restricted, as the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] will restrict them, to three months' notice of intention to retire any portion of their circulation.

There should also be another amendment, similar to the one proposed by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. HAMMOND,] allowing an individual to sue a national bank in a State court in the same manner as the bank can now sue an individual. The banks should have no more rights in that respect than individual citizens have. I am not in favor of chartering any institution whereby the interests of the people may be endangered. I think Congress would be to blame if it gives powers to corporations like these without restricting them by every possible means so that the interests of the people may not be endangered by them.

Even if this bill is passed, other legislation will be necessary, or we will find ourselves curtailed of forty-one millions of national-bank currency by the last call of bonds, expiring August 1. I call upon the other side of the House to present some report besides this, in order to meet the difficulty that will be upon us by the 1st day of August next. Otherwise, when September and October and November come, you will find a money panic, and I do not want you to charge that upon this side of the House.

I believe that a 3 per cent. funding bill should be passed by which the Secretary of the Treasury would be allowed to fund all the bonds of the United States now due at 3 per cent., giving to the one who secures the first new bond the right to the longest bond. I think that is the way out of this difficulty, and the only way to prevent a large contraction of the currency.

Of the 3½ per cent. extended bonds, thirteen and a half millions have been taken as a basis of circulation by the national banks that have been chartered within the last year or year and a half. Of the circulation of this country two hundred and forty millions is dependent upon bonds payable at the option of the Secretary of the Treasury. Now, that is no way in which to leave the currency of the country; and I call upon gentlemen on the other side of the House, while we are willing to vote for this bill with proper restrictions, to present us a funding bill which will place our currency and the business interests of the country upon a firm and satisfactory basis.

Mr. DWIGHT. Why do you not present such a bill? You seem to know what is wanted.

Mr. FLOWER. What is the use of any one presenting such a bill here unless he is on the right side of the House?

Mr. BRUMM. Does the gentleman favor the Crapo bill?

Mr. FLOWER. I told you that I was in favor of the Crapo bill if nothing better is presented. I will vote for that bill with these amendments.

Mr. HAZELTON. How about the bill without the amendments?

Mr. FLOWER. I doubt if I vote for it without the amendments. A funding bill such as that I spoke of, or something of the kind, will relieve us from this difficulty. The banks will not take these bonds now as a basis of circulation. They know that $150,000,000 of the debt is paid every year, and that in three or four years four or five hundred millions of these bonds will be paid off and the circulation dependent upon them will be gone.

In that case something else will have to take the place of this circulation. It may be Treasury notes, as my friends from Missouri [Messrs. BUCKNER and BLAND] suggest; it may be the circulation of State banks, as my friend from North Carolina [Mr. DOWD] suggests. But we will be called together here in a hurry some time between now and next fall, if we have good crops, unless something in relation to funding this debt is accomplished. People will not take these bonds which they know will be paid off so soon, and the banks will have to retire their circulation, as they are doing now.

Mr. CRAPO. The gentleman is aware that a funding bill has already passed the Senate.

Mr. FLOWER. Yes; but I have been informed by the Committee on Ways and Means that nothing will be done with it this session.

One more point, in addition to the fact that the circulation will be decreased to the extent of $41,000,000 by the 1st day of August next. The Secretary of the Treasury has recommended to us not to issue any more certificates based upon gold deposited in the Treasury. Now, I do not believe in that policy at this time.

Mr. BLAND. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. FLOWER. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLAND. What I desire to say to the gentleman is this: he has now admitted that the national banking associations as such must go out of existence when these 3½ per cent. extended bonds are paid off, or that there will be a large contraction of the currency; and the gentleman says that we must have a funding bill postponing the payment of this debt in order to enable these banks to continue in existence. Now, I have proposed a substitute for that proposition, and I would like to have the gentleman examine it and see if it is not better than continuing this debt in order to accommodate these banks. I am glad to hear this honest confession, for that is all there is in this bill and this movement.

Mr. FLOWER. In the first place, Mr. Speaker, I have not said that the national banks would have to go when their circulation goes; but I did say that $41,000,000 of this circulation would go by the 1st of August, even if this bill should pass, and that something would have to take the place of this amount. I ask the other side of the House to give us proper legislation on this subject. My judgment is that if you would take off the internal-revenue taxes from every thing except distilled spirits and the circulation of the national banks, we could reform the tariff very readily. I believe that four men in this House could draft a measure of reform within thirty days. You need only pay between $28,000,000 and $30,000,000 annually for the next twenty-six years to wipe out all your payable indebtedness. Two hundred and fifty million dollars will be due in nine years; and you cannot pay it with Treasury notes; nor can you pay in that way the amount falling due in 1907. Our creditors would not take Treasury notes.

Mr. RICE, of Missouri. Do they not take them?

Mr. FLOWER. I would not take them if I owned a bond payable in coin.

It has been circulated throughout the country that the Banking and Currency Committee is composed mostly of national bankers, and that the banks have it all their own way in that committee. Now, sir, I never owned a dollar of national-bank stock in my life. I would not own a charter if you would give it to me, because I believe that by any other system of banking bankers can make more money. I would not vote for this bill did I not believe that temporarily it is the best expedient and provides the cheapest currency for the people.

Mr. HAZELTON. Then I understand the gentleman to say that those who go into banking for speculation can make more money by any other system than the national banking system?

Mr. FLOWER. There is no taxable property in the United States taxed so heavily by the States as that of the national banks; and next to the national banks in point of taxation comes the State banks. The Treasury note is like the greenback, a debt of the Government. It is not taxable by the States; but the moment that capital goes into a national bank it becomes a target for State taxation.

Mr. HAZELTON. The bonds of the national banks are not taxed.

Mr. FLOWER. When a national bank is established it must be upon the basis of Government bonds, and when a State taxes the stock of the bank it virtually taxes the bonds. The national-bank note is taxable by the State as personal property. The greenback and the Treasury note are not taxable at all. I refer gentlemen to section 3701 of the Revised Statutes. As a last resort we may have to issue Treasury notes, but I do not believe they would be the cheapest currency.

I yield the residue of my time to my colleague, [Mr. HEWITT, of New York.]

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I am obliged to my colleague; but I am not prepared to go on to-day. If he will reserve his time, I would be glad to use it hereafter, or I will take the floor now and yield for a motion to adjourn.

Mr. BUCKNER. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. FLOWER. Mr. Speaker, I will reserve the remainder of my time. How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa.) Forty-five minutes.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to reports of committees of conference on bills of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. No. 3208) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, and for the armament thereof, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. No. 4466) making appropriations for the Agricultural Department of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. No. 420) to establish a court of appeals;

A bill (S. No. 881) for the relief of Lieutenant Edward S. Farrow, United States Army;

A bill (S. No. 1020) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Arkansas River at the town of Van Buren, Crawford County, Arkansas; and

A bill (S. No. 1440) relating to the registration of trade-marks.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. RICE, of Missouri, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD remarks on House bill No. 1655, relating to interstate commerce. [See Appendix.]

JOSEPH BELL.

Mr. CONVERSE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6185) granting a pension to Joseph Bell; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

SOLOMON DUPLER.

Mr. CONVERSE also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6186) granting a pension to Solomon Dupler; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

PARDON WORSLEY.

Mr. WALKER. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw from the files of the House papers in the case of Pardon Worsley, for reference to the Committee on Claims.

The SPEAKER. That can be done through the petition-box.

JAMES B. BEAVER.

Mr. CHAPMAN, (for Mr. WISE, of Virginia,) from the Committee on War Claims, reported back adversely the petition of James B. Beaver; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

AGNES AND MARIA DE LEON.

Mr. CHAPMAN (for Mr. WISE, of Virginia) also, from the same committee, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. No. 3466) for the relief of Anges and Maria De Leon, heirs-at-law of Rebecca L. De Leon, deceased; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

LIEUTENANT JOHN W. DANENHOWER.

Mr. ALDRICH, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 210) tendering the thanks of Congress to and conferring additional rank on Lieutenant John W. Danenhower, United States Navy; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

GOODS EAST OF GOOD HOPE CAPE.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6187) to amend the act entitled "An act to repeal the discriminating duties on goods produced east of the Cape of Good Hope," approved May 4, 1882; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

RICHARD H. AND JAMES PORTER.

On motion of Mr. BRIGGS, by unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 905) for the relief of Richard H. and James Porter was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION.

Mr. ALDRICH, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills and joint resolution of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. No. 459) donating condemned cannon and cannon-balls to the city of Topeka, Kansas, for monumental purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 605) donating cannon and cannon-balls for use and ornament about a suitable soldiers' monument at Portland, Maine;

A bill (H. R. No. 679) donating condemned cannon and cannon-balls for monumental purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 1287) to authorize the Secretary of War to furnish condemned cannon for the soldiers' cemetery at Gallipolis, Ohio;

A bill (H. R. No. 1290) granting a pension to Modena Smith;

A bill (H. R. No. 2195) donating condemned cast-iron cannon to the Soldiers' Monument Association of Birmingham, Connecticut;

A bill (H. R. No. 2552) to donate condemned cannon to the Soldiers' and Sailors' Association of Bellaire, Ohio;

A bill (H. R. No. 3001) to authorize the Secretary of War to turn over to Sampson Post No. 22 of the Grand Army of the Republic, of Rochester, New Hampshire, four condemned cannon;

A bill (H. R. No. 3333) to donate one condemned cast-iron cannon to the citizens of Otsego, Michigan;

A bill (H. R. No. 3877) donating condemned cannon to the Soldiers' and Sailors' Monumental Association of Lycoming County, Pennsylvania;

A bill (H. R. No. 4545) to authorize the Secretary of War to turn over to E. E. Sturtevant Post No. 2 of the Grand Army of the Republic, of Concord, New Hampshire, six condemned cannon, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 4585) to donate four condemned iron cannon to the city of Mansfield, Ohio, to be placed on the public square near the soldiers' bronze monument;

A bill (H. R. No. 4745) to authorize the Secretary of War to furnish condemned cannon for the soldiers' cemetery at Hamilton, Ohio;

A bill (H. R. No. 5211) granting four condemned cannon to the town of Brandon, Vermont, to be placed near a soldiers' monument in said town; and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 8) authorizing the Secretary of War to deliver to the city of Waterloo, Iowa, three condemned cannon and four cannon-balls, for decoration of soldiers' cemetery.

PLATE-PRINTING BY STEAM-PRESSES.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, in response to resolution of the House of the 4th ultimo, transmitting certain information relative to plate-printing by steam-presses, &c.; which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

JAMES ROBINSON.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6188) for the relief of James Robinson; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

SOLDIERS' MONUMENT, WHITE HAVEN, PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. KLOTZ, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6189) donating cannon to the White Haven, Pennsylvania, Soldiers' Monument Association; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

ADULTERATION OF BUTTER AND CHEESE.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I ask by unanimous consent to publish in the RECORD the body of a petition signed by 3,202 citizens of Chicago and its vicinity.

There was no objection, and the body of the petition is as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

We, the undersigned, grocerymen, commission men, provision dealers, and citizens of Chicago and vicinity, do hereby petition your honorable bodies to pass a national law to prevent the adulteration of butter and cheese with foreign fats.

The petition was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

EQUALIZATION OF PAY.

Mr. HOUK. I ask unanimous consent to change the reference of the resolution equalizing the pay of the employés of the Senate and House from the Committee on Appropriations to the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let us have the regular order.

The SPEAKER. That cuts off unanimous consent.

And then (at four o'clock and twenty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. ARMFIELD: Six petitions of citizens of North Carolina, for an appropriation for educational purposes—severally to the Committee on Education and Labor.

By Mr. CANDLER: The petition of citizens of Newton, Massachusetts, for an appropriation for educational purposes to be distributed on the basis of illiteracy—to the same committee.

By Mr. CLEMENTS: Five petitions of citizens of Georgia, for an appropriation for educational purposes—severally to the same committee.

By Mr. DARRALL: The petition of citizens of the Parish of Iberia, Louisiana, for an appropriation for educational purposes—to the same committee.

By Mr. HARDENBERGH: The resolutions adopted by the board of aldermen of Jersey City, New Jersey, relative to the imprisonment of American citizens in British jails—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. HENDERSON: The letter of the Secretary of War transmitting certain communications relating to, and 18 petitions of officers of the United States Army urging the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 1475) for the reorganization of the infantry branch of the Army—severally to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. MAGINNIS: The petition of Mary C. Hamilton, for relief—to the same committee.

By Mr. McMILLIN: The petition of J. M. Davis, for relief—to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. MILLER: The petition of William J. Ney and many others, of the Fifteenth Regiment National Guards of Pennsylvania, for the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 2143) to amend title 16 of the Revised Statutes, relative to the militia—to the Committee on the Militia.

Also, the petition of Mercer (Pennsylvania) Post Grand Army of the Republic, urging the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 5269) providing for payment of female nurses who served through the late war—to the Committee on War Claims.

Also, memorial of Post No. 169, Grand Army of the Republic, of Mercer, Pennsylvania, in favor of the passage of the bill granting a pension of $40 per month to all soldiers who lost an arm, leg, foot, &c.—to the Select Committee on the Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay.

By Mr. MOREY: The petition of L. D. Brown and others, of Hamilton, Ohio, for an appropriation for educational purposes—to the Committee on Education and Labor.

By Mr. OATES: The petition of Hon. S. M. Edwards and others, citizens of Dale County, Alabama, for an appropriation for educational purposes—to the same committee.

By Mr. PRESCOTT: The petition of the Canal Boat Owners' Association of New York, in opposition to the passage of the bill to limit the size of tows on the Hudson River, in the State of New York—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. RITCHIE: The petition of members of the board of education of Toledo, Ohio, for an appropriation for educational purposes—to the Committee on Education and Labor.

By Mr. SHERWIN: The joint resolutions of the Legislature of Illinois, relative to the imprisonment of American citizens in British jails—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. VAN AERNAM: The petition of 128 citizens of Chautauqua County, New York, praying for the enactment of a general law to regulate immigration—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. WHEELER: The petition of D. C. White and others, citizens of Lawrence County, Alabama, for an appropriation for educational purposes—to the Committee on Education and Labor.

SENATE.

MONDAY, May 15, 1882.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was read.

THE JOURNAL—GENEVA AWARD.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I rise to a matter connected with the Journal. The Journal states that House bill No. 4197, in regard to the Geneva award, was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. I believe that was not the purpose of the Senate or the Chair. The bill has been before the committee once, and they have made their recommendation on the subject. This bill, therefore, should remain on the table of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Journal will be amended so as to discharge the committee from the consideration of the subject, and the bill will lie on the table.

Mr. INGALLS. Is the House bill the same as the Senate bill reported from the committee?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not, but the Committee on the Judiciary have had the entire subject under consideration and have reported a bill on the subject.

Mr. HOAR. The bill which the House has passed, as I understand, was introduced here in substance, and I think in the same words substantially. It was then referred to the Committee on the Judiciary early in the session, so they had that proposition for legislation before them. They considered that and several other propositions, and have reported a bill which is now before the Senate. It is unnecessary to encumber the Judiciary Committee with a new reference of something they have considered and acted upon, and my suggestion is that the House bill remain on the table.

Mr. INGALLS. The fact that the Judiciary Committee have reported one bill on the subject does not render it necessary that the bill coming from the House should lie on the table. If it is the purpose of the Senator from Massachusetts to move the House bill in the Senate as a substitute for the bill reported by the Senate committee, then the course suggested by him might be advisable; otherwise it appears to me the proper disposition of the bill would be to refer it, although I am indifferent about the matter.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to examine the bill, and see whether the proper mode of testing the sense of the Senate would be to take up the House bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The committee will be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and it will lie on the table, if there be no objection.

Mr. HOAR. I spoke to the Chair, as the Chair will recollect, when the bill first came over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair remembers, but he was not in the chair at the time the reference was made.

Mr. HOAR. It was a mere act of the Clerk, without the direction of the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Journal as corrected will be approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CALL. I present a petition, and ask that it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be read, if there be no objection.

The Principal Legislative Clerk proceeded to read the petition, as follows:

To the Hon. DAVID DAVIS,
President of the Senate of the United States:

Your petitioners, residents of the District of Columbia, and engaged in the business of buying and slaughtering animals for food purposes in said District, respectfully represent to your honorable committee that, as they are informed, "A bill to provide for the care and inspection of all animals to be slaughtered for food purposes in the District of Columbia, and to incorporate the Washington stock-yard, abattoir, and rendering company"——

Mr. ALLISON. It is not necessary to read that long paper.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It can be printed in the RECORD without reading. Does the Senator from Florida care about having the petition read?

Mr. CALL. Not if it goes into the RECORD.

Mr. HARRIS. What has been read necessarily goes into the RECORD. I suppose from what has already been read the petition should be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. CALL. The object of the petitioners was for it to go into the RECORD.

Mr. HARRIS. I see no necessity for encumbering the RECORD with such a petition. Let it go to the proper committee, where it will be investigated.

Mr. CALL. I have no objection to that course, if there be objection to the reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. BUTLER presented a petition of W. W. Elliott and others, citizens of Port Royal, South Carolina, praying for the passage of a bill for the establishment of a coaling-dock and naval storehouse at Port Royal, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a memorial of the Robinson Post No. 135 Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Ohio, in favor of certain modifications of the pension laws; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions

Mr. PENDLETON. I present a petition of Robinson Post No. 135 Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Ohio, praying for the passage of an act to provide for the just equalization of soldiers' bounties; for making it less difficult to prove just claims, and more easy to prevent fraud in the procurement of pensions; to give every soldier and sailor, upon proof, arrearages from the beginning of his disability; to increase the pension of honorably-discharged privates, their widows and orphans; and that no material reduction of the tax on whisky and tobacco be made until these demands of the soldiers and sailors are complied with. I move the reference of their petition to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON presented a petition of citizens of Iowa, praying for an appropriation for the education of the native people of Alaska; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. PLUMB presented a petition of citizens of Kansas, praying for an appropriation for the education of the native people of Alaska; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. McMILLAN. At the second session of the Forty-sixth Congress I had the honor to introduce a bill to aid in the endowment of a school of forestry at Saint Paul, Minnesota. That Congress having terminated without action by the committee, I shall at the proper time this morning introduce a bill to the same effect, and at this time I present a memorial of the American Forestry Congress, the sessions of which were lately held in the city of Cincinnati, approving the terms of the bill and recommending its passage. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and I commend it to the favorable consideration of that committee, and ask the attention of the chairman of the committee to the subject.

Mr. SHERMAN. A petition similar to the one now presented was referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. McMILLAN. This petition may take that reference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

FOURTEENTH STREET EXTENSION.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to move a correction of the reference of Miscellaneous Document No. 87, relating to the widening of Fourteenth street, in Washington, which was by inadvertence sent to the Committee on the District of Columbia instead of the Committee on Appropriations. The matter is now pending before the latter committee. I ask that the reference be changed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Committee on the District of Columbia will be discharged from the further consideration of the miscellaneous document, and it will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. GARLAND, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 7) declaring the true intent and meaning of the act of March 3, 1855, in its application to the claims of the officers and sailors of the United States sloop Marion and United States frigate United States, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, which was agreed to; and the joint resolution was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill (S. No. 1877) amending clause 2 of section 2426 of the Revised Statutes of the United States in reference to persons in the naval service of the United States entitled to bounty-land warrants; which was read twice by its title.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1788) to amend the law relating to the bonds of executors in the District of Columbia, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1860) to attach the county of Hardeman, in the State of Tennessee, to the eastern division of the western district of Tennessee, reported it without amendment.

Mr. ROLLINS, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1774) authorizing the sale of the land and premises formerly occupied as a site for the post-office in the city of New York, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3846) for the erection of a public building at Louisville, Kentucky, reported it without amendment.

Mr. PLUMB, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1237) to extend the time for making proof and payment on desert-land entries, reported it without amendment.

Mr. VEST, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 880) to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Hannibal, in the State of Missouri, reported it without amendment.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4701) to provide for the erection of a public building at Detroit, Michigan, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4177) for the erection of a public building at Council Bluffs, Iowa, reported it without amendment.

Mr. PENDLETON. I am instructed by the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment to make a report, with an appendix containing certain testimony taken before that committee, to accompany the bill (S. No. 133) to regulate and improve the civil service of the United States.

Mr. ALLISON. Is all the testimony taken by the committee appended to the report?

Mr. PENDLETON. No, sir, but it is the report which is now submitted. The testimony taken by the committee is in the possession of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be printed.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 5575) providing for a public building at Jackson, Tennessee, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1776) to provide for the erection of a public building at New Castle, Delaware, reported it without amendment.

Mr. McMILLAN. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1810) to authorize the Rock Island and Southwestern Railway Company to construct a bridge over the Mississippi River at New Boston, State of Illinois, to report it with amendments; and I am instructed by the committee to ask for the present consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to having the bill read?

Mr. INGALLS. It will be read for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It may be read for information, subject to objection.

The Principal Legislative Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. BUTLER. Is this bill being considered under the Anthony rule?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was reported from a committee and the Senator from Minnesota asks for its present consideration with a view to pass it. It is morning business and the bill is being read for information.

Mr. BUTLER. There has been a good deal said about departing from the Anthony rule——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Calendar under the Anthony rule has not yet been reached. Does the Senator object to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BUTLER. No, sir; I do not know that I object to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading will continue.

The Principal Legislative Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, but before concluding was interrupted by Mr. INGALLS. This bill is in such condition that evidently it cannot be acted on now. If the Senator from Minnesota desires action to-day I suggest it had better be deferred until it can be put in proper shape.

Mr. McMILLAN. Let it go over until to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go over and the amendments will be printed.

Mr. PLATT, from the Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 854) for the relief of W. C. Dodge, reported it with an amendment; and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CALL asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1878) to attach the county of Dade, in the State of Florida, to the southern district of Florida; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. ROLLINS asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1879) to provide for the purchase of a site on which to erect an extension of the Post-Office Department building; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. McMILLAN asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1880) to aid in the endowment of a school of forestry at Saint Paul, Minnesota; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. GEORGE. I ask leave to introduce a bill at the request of a constituent, and I do so without intending to approve or condemn the bill.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 1881) to aid in the construction of the railroad and levee of the Memphis and New Orleans Railroad Levee Company; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Railroads.

Mr. FERRY asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1882) granting a pension to James T. Donahue; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1883) for the erection of a public building at La Crosse, Wisconsin; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. WINDOM asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1884) granting a pension to William J. Duley; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HILL, of Colorado, asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1885) granting the right of way over the public lands to the Eastern Washington Development Company for the construction of a railroad; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. ANTHONY asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 64) authorizing the sale of the Congressional Directory and the current numbers of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. PENDLETON asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 65) to provide for an international convention to recommend the establishment of a standard meridian for reckoning longitude and time; which was read twice by its title, and, together with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to present amendments in the form of a substitute for the bill (H. R. No. 5656) to amend the laws relating to the entry of distilled spirits in distillery and special bonded warehouses and the withdrawal of the same therefrom. I move that the amendments be printed and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CHILCOTT submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 5812) to establish post routes; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. HILL, of Colorado, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of Senate bill No. 740, Forty-fifth Congress, second session, "to authorize the Secretary of War to relinquish and turn over to the Interior Department certain parts of the Camp Douglas military reservation, in the Territory of Utah," be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs for the use of the said committee in the consideration of Senate bill No. 1862, Forty-seventh Congress, first session.

TAX ON DISTILLED SPIRITS.

Mr. BECK. The resolution which I introduced the other day in relation to House bill No. 5656, extending the bonded period on distilled spirits, I propose to call up at two o'clock instead of now, with the consent of the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. PLUMB.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair so understood that it was to come up after the morning hour.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. PLATT. I ask to be excused from further service on the special committee raised to investigate the administration of the collection of internal revenue in the sixth collection district of North Carolina.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Connecticut? The Chair hears none, and the Senator is excused. The Chair appoints in his place the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MITCHELL.]

CREEK ORPHAN FUND.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business the morning hour is closed.

Mr. SLATER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 126) to reimburse the Creek orphan fund. I will state that when this bill was reached on the Calendar objection was made to its consideration, but since then the rule has been changed so as to allow a motion to be made to proceed to the consideration of a bill reached on the Calendar to which objection may be made. I think it is my duty, under the instructions of the Committee on Indian Affairs, to make such a motion at this time. It is not a bill that will take any great length of time.

Mr. HOAR. What is the order of business?

Mr. SLATER. Number 36. It is a bill which has been several times passed, and it is one of importance to these people.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill was passed over without prejudice, the Chair understands.

Mr. COCKRELL. I beg to say that I do not think it was passed over without prejudice. I think objection was made to its consideration and it was passed over on that ground.

Mr. SLATER. But I understand under the amended rule I have a right to move to take up the bill at this time.

Mr. SHERMAN. I object to its consideration on the ground that the bill is so important that it ought not to be considered under a five-minute rule as to debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio objects to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. SLATER. I understand the objection, but I understand under the rules I have a right to make the motion to proceed to the consideration of the bill, and I think I should do it at this time in preference to doing it after two o'clock, in consequence of the press of business at that period of the day. I hope the Senate will sustain me and agree to take up the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon calls under the Anthony rule for the consideration of the bill (S. No. 126) to reimburse the Creek orphan fund. The consideration of the bill is objected to, and the Senator moves to proceed to the consideration of the bill notwithstanding the objection. If that motion prevails then the bill is to be considered without reference to the limit upon debate fixed by the rule.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ought to give notice to the Senate that some years ago, when I was before a member of the Senate, I examined this question very carefully. I believe there is no ground of merit in this claim. It is a very large sum, between one and three hundred thousand dollars; I do not know what it is now. I believe it has been twice paid and that nothing is due at this time. As a matter of course it involves the discussion of an old matter, which I believe originated as early as 1831. I cannot now recall all the facts. I hope the Senate will not take it up. If the bill is taken up I shall have to refresh my recollection of the matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will suggest that the merits of a bill cannot be debated on a motion to proceed to its consideration. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Oregon, [Mr. SLATER,] to proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The motion was not agreed to.

REFUNDING OF INCOME TAX.

Mr. COCKRELL. Regular order, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first case on the Calendar will be called.

The bill (S. No. 1068) for the relief of certain citizens of Tennessee was announced as first in order.

Mr. HARRIS. The bill and report have been read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill and report have been read, and the bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Tennessee state in one word in his own way what the bill is? I do not remember the report.

Mr. HARRIS. There were certain internal-revenue taxes on income that were collected in violation of the regulations of the Department. The then Secretary of the Treasury recommended that an act be passed to refund the taxes, and the present Commissioner of Internal Revenue recommends the passage of this bill just as it stands before the Senate. The bill as it stands is a substitute for the original Senate bill. There is just one amendment as a substitute, and that substitute was suggested to the committee by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and the committee adopted his suggestion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the Committee on Finance.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Perhaps the Senator from Tennessee can inform me, is this a general bill to meet all cases where there have been improper collections?

Mr. HARRIS. It is not. It gives relief to the citizens named in the bill.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Why not amend it and make it a general bill? Because there may be citizens in other States who have a similar claim to have the tax refunded.

Mr. HARRIS. I do not know that there are other cases. If there are I have not investigated them. Every claim included in the bill has been carefully examined by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and he has reported to the Committee on Finance of the Senate in respect of the merits of these claims. I know nothing of other kindred cases, and the bill was not intended to cover any other cases.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS ADVERSELY REPORTED.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next bill on the Calendar, the bill (S. No. 56) for the improvement of the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers, is adversely reported.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let that and the next bill, (S. No. 1414,) providing for the construction, completion, repairing, and preserving of levees on the Mississippi River, also reported adversely, be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Substitutes have been passed for these bills, and they will be postponed indefinitely.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT ROCHESTER.

The bill (S. No. 821) for a public building at Rochester, New York, was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. LAPHAM. I make objection to the consideration of that bill at this time. There is a House bill pending in the Senate for the same purpose.

Mr. MORRILL. The chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds will present the House bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York ask to have the House bill substituted for this bill?

Mr. LAPHAM. No, sir; not at this time.

Mr. ROLLINS. I desire to state the action of the Senate committee on this matter. They have instructed me to report back the House bill favorably and ask that it be substituted in place of the Senate bill.

Mr. LAPHAM. I cannot consent to that substitution now for reasons which I will state at the proper time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill cannot be considered unless the Senate agrees to do so on motion, because the Senator from New York objects to it.

Mr. INGALLS. Let the bill retain its place on the Calendar.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I trust my colleague will not object to the consideration of the bill under the Anthony rule. The bill has been passed by the House and is an important measure.

Mr. LAPHAM. I object to the consideration of the bill for the reason which I shall state. There is no report accompanying it, no facts whatever. There is a House bill here which is accompanied by a report and with a statement of facts, upon which this case can be properly considered. I desire that action shall be deferred until we reach the House bill, which is upon the Calendar, I understand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill can be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. The committee have instructed their chairman to report the House bill as a substitute for the Senate bill, and it can be considered under the Anthony rule as well as any other. I desire to have the House bill taken up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate bill has been reached and the Senator's colleague objects to its consideration at this time. The matter will have to go over until the House bill is reached.

Mr. LAPHAM. That is all I ask.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed by the clerk that the House bill has not yet been reported back.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from New York has a right to make a motion to proceed to the consideration of the bill if he desires.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I have no desire to materially interfere with the consideration of bills under the Anthony rule, but this is a bill of importance to my State, and it is a bill which can be considered as well under the Anthony rule as any other. Unless there is general objection in the Senate, I shall move its present consideration, and then I shall ask that the House bill be substituted for the Senate bill.

Mr. HARRISON. Has the House bill been reported yet?

Mr. MILLER, of New York. The chairman of the committee is ready to report it at this time as a substitute.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report would not be in order now, and the Chair cannot receive it. The report should have been made during the routine morning business. The bill may be passed over to-day without prejudice and taken up at any time hereafter.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. Do I understand the Chair to say that it is not in order for the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to report the House bill as a substitute for the Senate bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. During the consideration of bills on the Calendar under the Anthony rule the House bill cannot be reported to the Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. Would it not be in order, however, to offer the House bill as a substitute for the Senate bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Certainly. Any one may offer any substitute he pleases. After the bill is taken up for consideration any Senator may move that as a substitute.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I have no desire to waste the time of the Senate under the Anthony rule, and under the ruling of the Chair I will waive the consideration of the bill at the present time, letting it go without prejudice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over without prejudice.

ZELORA CRUMPACKER.

The bill (S. No. 785) for the relief of Zelora Cumpacker was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This bill was reported adversely, and will be postponed indefinitely if there be no objection.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it remain on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next bill will be announced.

CALIFORNIA SCHOOL LANDS.

The bill (S. No. 612) to enable the State of California to take lands in lieu of the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections found to be mineral lands, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That an act entitled "An act to provide for the survey of the public lands in California, the granting of pre-emption rights therein, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1853, shall be construed as giving to the State of California the right to select for school purposes other lands in lieu of such sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections as may have been or shall be found to be mineral lands: Provided, That such indemnity selections shall be made from the surveyed public lands of the United States in the State of California subject to entry under the general laws, and not mineral, nor occupied by actual settlers, nor reserved for any purpose, nor appropriated under any law of the United States.

Mr. INGALLS. Let the report be read.

The Principal Legislative Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. VAN WYCK on the 27th of March:

The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 612) to enable the State of California to take lands in lieu of the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections found to be mineral lands, report:

That there can be no objection to grant the State of California the right to select and have approved agricultural lands in lieu of the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections, (school lands,) where the same are mineral.

The General Land Office indorses the main features of the bill, and to meet the suggestion of that office the accompanying bill is recommended as a substitute.

The Land Commissioner advised that land should be taken at single minimum rates. The committee have differed therein, and provide that any agricultural lands may be taken.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 6179) directing the Secretary of State to take the necessary steps for the removal of the remains of the late General Kilpatrick, minister to Chili, from Chili to the State of New Jersey for interment; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 459) donating condemned cannon and cannon-balls to the city of Topeka, Kansas, for monumental purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 605) donating cannon and cannon-balls for use and ornament about a suitable soldiers' monument at Portland, Maine;

A bill (H. R. No. 679) donating condemned cannon and cannon-balls for monumental purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 1287) to authorize the Secretary of War to furnish condemned cannon for the soldiers' cemetery at Gallipolis, Ohio;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 8) authorizing the Secretary of War to deliver to the city of Waterloo, Iowa, three condemned cannon and four cannon-balls, for decoration of soldiers' cemetery.

ROGER N. STEMBEL.

The bill (S. No. 339) providing for the pay of Rear-Admiral Roger N. Stembel was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. A bill of a like character to that has passed the House of Representatives and is now pending before the Naval Committee. I therefore ask that this bill be passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be passed over without prejudice.

HEIRS OF THOMAS TOBY.

The bill (S. No. 543) for the relief of the heirs of Thomas Toby, deceased, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the heirs of Thomas Toby, deceased, of New Orleans, $45,000 out of the balance of the fund remaining in the Treasury of the United States reserved for the payment of the creditors of the late Republic of Texas, under the acts of Congress of September 9, 1850, and February 28, 1855.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with amendments.

The first amendment was, after the word "pay," in line 4, to strike out "out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the heirs of Thomas Toby, deceased, of the city of New Orleans, in the State of Louisiana."

Mr. SAULSBURY. Is there a report in that case?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No, sir. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] reported the bill.

Mr. COKE. There is a report, I think.

Mr. GARLAND. There is no report by the committee of the Senate. There is a report on the entire case made in the other House by Mr. CULBERSON, of Texas. On the examination I made myself in the Committee on the Judiciary, I did not think it necessary to submit a formal report. The facts in the case are very few and very simple, and can be stated by the Senator from Texas.

Mr. COKE. Mr. President, the case is simply this: Thomas Toby, for the relief of whose heirs this bill has been reported, was a wealthy New Orleans merchant. During the darkest hours of the Texas revolution an appeal was made to him for aid by the authorities of Texas. He responded with great liberality. The revenues of the Republic of Texas were pledged for the payment of her revolutionary debt, this one due to Thomas Toby among the rest. When Texas was annexed to the United States she was very considerably indebted, with her revenues pledged to her creditors. It was assumed by the creditors of Texas that when Texas came into the Union and transferred her custom-houses to the United States, the Government of the United States would become responsible for the public debt of Texas. That question was much discussed at the time, but was never determined, because subsequent events rendered it unnecessary.

In the adjustment of the northwestern boundary of Texas the Government of the United States, in consideration of the cession of a large tract of territory by Texas, agreed to issue to the State of Texas $10,000,000 in 5 per cent. stock, reserving $5,000,000 of this stock for the payment of the creditors of Texas, who claimed that the Government of the United States had become responsible for their debts; $5,000,000 were issued to Texas, and $5,000,000 were retained in the Treasury of the United States. There was considerable controversy between the creditors of Texas, and Texas and the authorities of the United States, before any payment was made, and before any payment was made the principal and interest of the retained stock amounted to $6,500,000.

About that time Texas had a claim against the Government of the United States for depredations of Indians on her frontier, amounting to $2,000,000. In the settlement of that claim, by act of Congress passed in 1855, $1,250,000 was added to the retained stock, making some $7,750,000 for payment of the creditors of Texas.

When this act of 1855 was passed the creditors of Texas presented their claims, the Government of the United States retaining the power to pay out this money, and they were paid, and it is believed that the claim now before the Senate is the last unpaid claim, the last debt of the Republic of Texas existing against that fund which has not been paid.

I have before me a statement from the Secretary of the Treasury showing that of this fund provided by Texas in her negotiations with the United States for the payment of her revolutionary debt there is now remaining in the Treasury $101,113.27.

Mr. ALLISON. That is of the $5,000,000 reserved?

Mr. COKE. Yes, sir; that yet remains in the Treasury.

Mr. MAXEY. The $5,000,000 reserved with the amount added by the act of 1855 for Indian depredations—the two added together.

Mr. COKE. The two added together constitute the fund provided by Texas for the payment of her revolutionary debt. Of that fund all has been paid out except $101,113.27, which the Secretary of the Treasury certifies was on the 30th of June, 1877, covered back into the Treasury.

The claim provided for by the pending bill is for $45,000. It has been audited by an act of the Legislature of Texas, a copy of which I have here, declaring it a just debt against the republic of Texas and against this reserved fund. This bill provides for the payment of that amount, $45,000, to the heirs of Thomas Toby, which will still leave some $70,000 in the Treasury of this fund, and no other debt against it.

Thomas Toby is dead, his wife is dead, neither lived to realize and enjoy the act of justice performed in this bill, but their children will receive its benefits, and the people of Texas, who when coming into the Union made provision for the payment of this sacred debt, will rejoice with them that it has been paid.

Mr. MAXEY. I wish to add to what my colleague has said that the $101,000 referred to by him is beyond doubt the money of the State of Texas subject to any claim or lien which any person may have upon that fund when presented in due form of law to the Secretary of the Treasury. The last claim that was ever presented as shown by the report of the Secretary of the Treasury was in 1870, twelve years ago. We have a right therefore to infer after the lapse of twelve years that there is no other claim. The Legislature of Texas, recognizing the Toby claim as a just claim against the State, passed an act authorizing the payment by the Secretary of the Treasury of the amount of that claim with a release on the part of the claimant Toby to the United States as well as to the State of Texas from any claim whatever to any more, and the bill so provides.

Mr. COKE. Upon conference with the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. GARLAND,] who reports the bill, the first amendment where the words "out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the heirs of Thomas Toby, deceased, of the city of New Orleans, in the State of Louisiana," are stricken out of the bill by the committee, should be rejected so that the words shall stand. The amendment should not be concurred in.

Mr. GARLAND. Those three lines should be restored. When the bill was reported from the committee I was not aware, as I have learned on subsequent examination, that this money had been covered back to the Treasury, amounting to $101,000, and so there will have to be a general appropriation instead of a specific appropriation out of that fund. So these three lines should be restored by rejecting the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary was to add to the bill:

To the heirs of Thomas Toby, deceased, in compliance with the joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Texas approved March 20, 1881, making an appropriation for the settlement of Thomas Toby's claim: Provided, That the said heirs shall file with the Secretary of the Treasury a duly certified copy of the said joint resolution and a full and complete release unto the State of Texas and to the United States of and for all claims whatever of their ancestor against Texas and the United States.

Mr. COKE. I desire to amend the mistake of the committee alluded to by the Senator from Arkansas by striking out of the amendment of the committee all from the word "out," in line 7, down to the word "deceased," both inclusive, in line 12. This amendment becomes necessary in consequence of the rejection of the previous amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment is to strike out, after the word "dollars" in line 7, down to and including the word "deceased" in line 12, which will be read.

The PRINCIPAL LEGISLATIVE CLERK. The words proposed to be stricken out are:

Out of the balance of the fund remaining in the Treasury of the United States reserved for the payment of the creditors of the late Republic of Texas under the acts of September 9, 1850, and February 28, 1855, to the heirs of Thomas Toby, deceased.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COKE. Now I desire to make a verbal amendment in line 15, to strike out "an appropriation" and insert in lieu thereof "provision."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. COKE. I ask that the bill be read as it now stands.

The Principal Legislative Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the heirs of Thomas Toby, deceased, of the city of New Orleans, in the State of Louisiana, the sum of $45,000 in compliance with the joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Texas approved March 30, 1881, making provision for the settlement of Thomas Toby's claim: Provided, That the said heirs shall file with the Secretary of the Treasury a duly certified copy of the said joint resolution and a full and complete release unto the State of Texas and to the United States of and for all claims whatever of their ancestor against Texas and the United States.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARGARET CASSIDY.

The bill (S. No. 591) for the relief of Mrs. Maggie Cassiday was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Patents with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated the Secretary of the Treasury pay to Mrs. Margaret Cassidy, widow of the late Peter Cassidy, the sum of $2,500, in full consideration for the entire past and future use by the Government of the United States of the pateuted machine for cutting vellum cloth of the said Peter A. Cassidy: Provided, That a full, sufficient, and legal transfer and license be executed and deposited with the Treasury Department, for the Government purposes, free of all charges of royalty.

Mr. CALL. Let the report be read in that case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Principal Legislative Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. CALL March 27:

The Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 591) for the relief of Mrs. Margaret Cassidy, widow of Peter A. Cassidy, deceased, have duly considered the same and accompanying papers, and recommend that it pass with amendment as submitted at the end of this report.

The facts upon which this recommendation is based are so fully set forth in House report No. 779, Forty-seventh Congress, first session, that your committee ask to make it a part of their report.

"[House Report No. 779, Forty-seventh Congress, first session.]

"The Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1392) for the relief of Mrs. Margaret Cassidy, widow of the late Peter A. Cassidy, which asks for remuneration for the use of his patent machine for cutting vellum cloth, adopted and used by the United States Government, make the following report:

"That the committee find the facts to be as stated in House Report No. 1768, Forty-sixth Congress, second session, which said report is hereto annexed and made a part of this report, and is as follows:

"'[House Report No. 1768, Forty-sixth Congress, second session.]

"'The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Mrs. Peter A. Cassidy for compensation for a machine invented by her late husband and now in use by the Government, have considered the same, and respectfully report:

"'This claim was considered and favorably reported upon by the Committee of Claims of the Forty-fifth Congress (Forty-fifth Congress, third session, Report No. 8,) but no final action was reached. Their report was as follows:

"'"Peter A. Cassidy was employed in the Second Auditor's Office of the Treasury Department from August 1, 1867, to October 10, 1876. While thus employed he invented and caused to be patented a machine for cutting the vellum cloth extensively used in repairing vouchers, &c. By means of this machine he was enabled to do the work which would otherwise have required five men. This is shown by the Auditor, and the machine is still in use, and is considered indispensable by the Auditor. By a statement of Joseph Barton, now in charge of archives division, under the old plan two men could cut twenty-five strips in five cuts; by the new device, one man can cut fifty strips in two cuts.

"'"The machine was patented July 11, 1876. Peter A. Cassidy died in January, 1878, without having received any compensation from the Government for the use of his invention, and his attending physician, William Ward, says that this circumstance preyed upon his mind and added to the causes that produced his death. He left the petitioner (his widow) and eight children. She asks that the Government pay to her the sum of $10,000 for the use of her husband's invention. By the use of the machine one person can do the work of twenty-five.

"'"It is manifestly just that the Government should pay for the use of the patent, and we think $2,500 not an unreasonable sum for that use. We therefore report the accompanying bill with the recommendation that it do pass."

"'This committee concur in the conclusions and recommendations of the former committee, and report the accompanying bill.'

"The committee therefore adopt said House report as the report of this committee, and report the accompanying bill, as amended, for her relief, with recommendation that it pass."

Amend by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting in lieu thereof as follows:

"That out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, the Secretary of the Treasury pay to Mrs. Margaret Cassidy, widow of the late Peter A. Cassidy, the sum of $2,500 in full consideration for the entire past and future use by the Government of the United States of the patented machine for cutting vellum cloth of the said Peter A. Cassidy: Provided, That a full, sufficient, and legal transfer and license be executed and deposited with the Treasury Department for the Government purposes, free of all charges of royalty."

Amend title so as to read "A bill for the relief of Mrs. Margaret Cassidy."

Mr. HARRIS. I ask the Senator from Florida if the invention is useful only to the Government, or if the patentee has received any benefit from the use of it by private persons?

Mr. CALL. The evidence in the House committee's report and as exhibited to us is that it was not used anywhere else; that the invention has been applied exclusively to the use of the Government.

Mr. PLATT. I will state that there was among the papers submitted to the committee a statement of the Second Auditor with reference to the necessity of the use of this machine, and I know also that it is very largely in use in the Pension Office, where the cloth is used to repair some eighteen thousand volumes of records, and a statement that $2,500 was a very reasonable compensation; and that was concurred in by the Secretary of the Treasury.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill for the relief of Mrs. Margaret Cassidy."

JAMES J. FAUGHT.

The bill (S. No. 336) for the relief of James J. Faught, late of Company D, Eighth Missouri Cavalry, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, after the word "cavalry," in line 5, to insert "as of date November 26, 1863;" so as to make the bill read:

That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, directed to issue an honorable discharge to James J. Faught from Company D, Eighth Regiment of Missouri Cavalry, as of date November 26, 1863, and to amend the military record of said Faught to show that he is not a deserter, and pay him all pay, bounty, and allowances that may be due him without reference to said charge of desertion.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. Is there a report in that case?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes, sir.

Mr. INGALLS. Let it be read.

The Principal Legislative Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. COCKRELL March 28.

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 336) for the relief of James J. Faught, late of Company D, Eighth Missouri Cavalry, have duly considered the same, and submit the following report:

This bill directs the Secretary of War to issue to said Faught an honorable discharge, and to amend his military record to show him not a deserter, and to pay him all pay, &c., due him, without reference to the charge of desertion.

In 1879, in the Forty-sixth Congress, a precisely similar bill was referred to the Secretary of War, and the following letters received from him:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, December 20, 1879.

SIR: Referring to your letter dated the 8th instant, requesting the military history of James J. Faught, late of Company D, Eighth Missouri Cavalry Volunteers, and such affidavits as are filed in his case, I beg to inclose herewith copy of report of the Adjutant-General, giving military history of this man, together with the affidavit of Captain R. P. Matthews.

Very respectfully,

ALEX. RAMSEY,
Secretary of War.

Hon. F. M. COCKRELL,
Of Committee on Military Affairs, United States Senate.

ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
December 16, 1879.

Respectfully returned to the Secretary of War.

It appears from the records that James J. Faught, age twenty-one years, was enrolled September 26, 1862, and mustered into service same date at Springfield, Missouri, as a private in Company D, Eighth Missouri Cavalry, to serve three years, and deserted January 1, 1863, at Prairie Grove, Arkansas.

This soldier, having failed to return to the service, or to report his case to the military authorities, from the date of his reported desertion (January 1, 1863) to July 20, 1865, the date of muster out of his company, was, upon application to this Department, in 1878, furnished a dishonorable discharge to date January 1, 1863, by reason of desertion.

Affidavit of Captain R. P. Matthews, the only evidence in the case, is herewith.

E. D. TOWNSEND,
Adjutant-General.

The letter of the Adjutant-General shows the state of the military record of said Faught, taken from Department files. Mr. Faught was never court-martialed, tried, or sentenced. On his muster-roll is the alleged desertion entered, nothing more. The question is, Was Mr. Faught a deserter as there alleged? Did said Faught, without leave, absent himself from his command without any intention of returning thereto, or with the intention of remaining absent therefrom without leave? Your committee have carefully considered the military record and the many affidavits presented, and find the following facts clearly established.

James J. Faught resided, in September, 1862, in Christian County, Missouri, some ten miles south of Springfield, and has ever since resided in that county. On September 26, 1862, he was duly enrolled and mustered into the service of the United States as a private in Company D, Eighth Regiment Missouri Cavalry Volunteers, at Springfield, Missouri, to serve for three years. His regiment remained at Springfield for some time, and while on duty there, in November, 1862, said Faught, while being relieved from guard duty, had the index and middle fingers of his right hand shot off by the accidental discharge of his gun, at the knuckle joint of his index finger and just above said joint of his middle finger. His regiment was, in the latter part of November or early in December, ordered to Prarie Grove, Arkansas. He accompanied his regiment there, and in December, 1862, by verbal permission, left his company and returned to his home, not being fit for any military duty. Captain Matthews was, in December, 1862, detailed on recruiting service and ordered to report to General E. B. Brown, commanding at Springfield, Missouri, and did so. About January 15, 1863, and after date of the alleged desertion, said Faught reported in person to said Captain Matthews in Springfield, Missouri, and still not being fit for duty, said Matthews gave him "a written permit to go home and remain at home until further orders or notice from him," intending to take him with him back to his regiment. Soon after Captain Matthews was ordered to Forsythe, Missouri, and knowing Faught was unfit for military duty, neglected to notify him. Said Faught remained at the home of his widowed mother within a short distance of Springfield, Missouri, within the lines of the United States Army to the close of the war, with the knowledge of his company officers and many members of his company who resided in same locality and saw him at home during the time. His captain says he intended to have him mustered out of the service for disability. It was ten months or more before he fully recovered. About April or May, 1863, said Faught reported to the provost-marshal at Springfield, Missouri, and was told to return home and remain till further orders. He was, during the entire time, at his home, within a short distance of Springfield, Missouri, where troops were stationed and military officers on duty. By some oversight, inattention or prejudice, on the part of those making out the muster and pay-roll, he was marked a deserter, and hence his record in War Department. Said Faught did not in fact or in law desert. The evidence clearly disproves the alleged desertion. He, however, performed no military duty, and in fact was not fit for such duty, and would in all probability have been mustered out prior to the date of muster out of his company.

It would not be just to grant him pay for the entire period up to July 20, 1865, when his company was mustered out. Your committee find that said Faught is entitled to an honorable discharge as of date November 26, 1863, and report back to the Senate said bill with the recommendation that it be amended by inserting just after the word "cavalry," in line 5, the words "as of date November 26, 1863," and that, as amended, it be passed.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next two cases are reported adversely. Shall they be indefinitely postponed?

Mr. INGALLS. No, Mr. President; House bill No. 389, granting a pension to Spencer W. Tryon, I prefer should remain on the Calendar, and I will ask the Senate to consider it at some subsequent time. The claim was once before Congress, when I was myself chairman of the Committee on Pensions, and I thought the case then deserved favorable action.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That bill will be passed over without prejudice.

Does the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. JACKSON] desire that the bill (S. No. 1270) granting arrears of pension to Laura J. Prine, shall remain on the Calendar?

Mr. JACKSON. It may as well be indefinitely postponed

Mr. CALL. No; let that remain on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. CALL. Without prejudice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Very well, that will be done.

RATES OF PENSION.

The bill (S. No 1595) fixing the rate of pensions in certain cases was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. JACKSON. That had better go over without prejudice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That will be the order.

Mr. PLATT. Does the Senator from Tennessee ask to have it go over without prejudice?

Mr. JACKSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. PLATT. It ought to be called up before long.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next case will be called.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS FROM STATE DEPARTMENT.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 111) authorizing the withdrawal from the Department of State of a certificate of indebtedness in favor of Mifflin Kennedy and Richard King against the Republic of Mexico was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CASES PASSED OVER.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next case is an adverse report, being Senate joint resolution No. 4 relative to placing on the retired list Thomas L. Crittenden.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be passed over. The next bill, (S. No. 1452,) granting a pension to Catherine Louisa Benton, is also an adverse report. Does the Senator from Maryland desire that the case shall be retained on the Calendar?

Mr. GROOME. I care nothing about it. I am satisfied it was not put on the Calendar at my instance. I simply made the report.

Mr. PLATT. That is a case in which the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] is interested.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

ARMS FOR THE MILITIA.

The bill (S. No. 1596) to amend section 1661 of the Revised Statutes, making an annual appropriation to provide arms for the militia, was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to have an explanation. The present annual appropriation is $200,000. Is this in addition to the present annual appropriation?

Mr. HAWLEY. No; it increases it to $600,000. The allowance of $200,000 was established in 1808, I think.

Mr. ALLISON. In 1808.

Mr. HARRISON. This bill is reported in answer to very numerous petitions.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is a very important additional burden on the Treasury. I should like to have the report read.

The Principal Legislative Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. SEWELL March 28:

The Committee on Military Affairs, who were instructed by resolution of the Senate passed February 25, 1882, "to inquire into the expediency of giving more aid than is now provided for to the various States and Territories, in order that the organization of the militia force of the country may be encouraged and promoted and its thoroughness and efficiency strengthened," respectfully report:

That, in addition to the resolution instructing us to consider the propriety of increasing the annual appropriation for the militia, there have been referred to us a large number of petitions from the officers of the militia relative to an increase of the appropriation and other amendments to the existing militia law.

These petitions come from nearly every State, and they present such a fair and concise statement of the defects of the law and the proper remedy for them that we quote them for the information of the Senate:

"The National Guard Association of the United States, composed of delegates from the active militia of the various States, respectfully represents:

"That the existing militia law has for many years been inoperative, for the reason that changes of circumstance and condition since its original enactment in 1792 would make any attempt to enforce its provisions now both absurd and impracticable. The law requires military duty from every citizen between eighteen and forty-five years of age, and requires each individual to provide himself with arms, ammunition, and knapsack. If the law should be enforced, the armed militia force of the country would amount to nearly seven million men. In place of the militia required by this law the States have fostered volunteer militia organizations, which have gradually increased until now they constitute the only actual military force. Several causes operate to hinder the efforts of the volunteer militia to perfect their organization, among which we would designate—

"First. The fact that they are not recognized by Federal laws.

"Second. That the annual appropriation of $200,000 for the militia, originally enacted in 1808, is entirely inadequate to properly equip the existing volunteer force.

"Third. That owing to the phraseology of the law the purpose of the annual appropriation is limited to supplying arms and equipments, and that camp equipage, clothing, blankets, and other articles absolutely needed by the militia cannot be procured by them except in those States that make State appropriations to supply them.

"We deem it unnecessary to present any argument as to the absolute necessity, under our form of government, of a well-organized, well-instructed militia, thoroughly equipped and ready for instant use. Hitherto such militia has only existed through the necessities of some of the individual States, or the voluntary exertions of a few individuals. We believe that the militia law requires thorough revision to adapt it to the militia organizations that time has demonstrated to be the only practicable ones.

"We are opposed to any change in the relations between the Federal Government and the militia that have now become well established by long custom. We are opposed to any change in the relative authority now exercised by the Federal and State governments over the militia, and we are opposed to any interference in the existing militia organization of the States or the creation of a new force. But we do most earnestly recommend and urge that the law should be adapted to the changes that have occurred in the organization of the militia, and make a necessary provision for them.

"We therefore recommend and ask that the existing militia law be amended as follows:

"1. To divide the enrolled militia into two classes, the active and inactive.

"2. To recognize the volunteer militia organizations of the respective States as the 'active militia.'

"3. To increase the annual appropriation for the militia to $1,000,000.

"4. To provide that the annual appropriation be applied to furnishing clothing and camp equipage, as well as arms and equipments, or, when desired by any State, may be applied to the payment of its militia for duty in annual camps of instruction."

A simple statement of fact appears to be a sufficient response to the resolution of the Senate. That an appropriation fixed in 1808 to provide for seventeen States, with a population of eight million, is inadequate to provide for thirty-eight States with a population of fifty million needs no argument. The Chief of Ordnance has for many years urged Congress to increase the appropriation; it was considered and favorably reported to the Senate by this committee in the Forty-fifth Congress, and we think it would be difficult to conceive any reasonable argument against it.

In connection with a favorable consideration of the proposition to increase the appropriation there are other points connected with it to which the committee deem it proper to call attention.

The existing law is very crude; it simply provides as follows:

"SEC. 1661. The annual sum of $200,000 is appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of providing arms and equipments for the whole body of the militia, either by purchase or manufacture, by and on account of the United States."

It will be perceived that no provision is made as to the mode of apportioning the appropriation between the States, no requirements for accountability for the property furnished, or limitation on the disposition that the States may make of it. The greatest defect of the law, however, is that it does not allow the furnishing of tents and other articles necessary to provide for camps of instruction. To this omission of the law is largely due the disparity between the different States in the strength and efficiency of the militia.

Your committee have deemed it proper, in addition to recommending an increase of the appropriation, to recommend also that the defects of the law relative to it be remedied. We accordingly report herewith a bill to increase the annual appropriation to $600,000, and making provisions for its apportionment, and for the care, accountability, and disposition of property issued under it. We also provide in the bill that each State shall only receive such proportion of the amount apportioned to it as the actual number of its active militia bears to a fixed maximum, and we believe this provision wisely calculated to foster and encourage the formation of volunteer organizations in those States where but a few now exist.

There have been no material changes in the law relative to the organization of the militia since its original enactment in 1792, and it is obvious that many of its provisions are now obsolete and many amendments desirable.

Your committee, however, deem the increase of the annual appropriation to be a matter of such apparent propriety that it is not likely to excite either opposition or debate, and we therefore report this bill for that special purpose, reserving the subject of a general revision of the law for more mature consideration.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to strike out the first section of this bill. We have at this session and at the last repealed the law of 1808, which makes a permanent appropriation for the supply of arms for the militia.

Mr. HAWLEY. Repealed it?

Mr. ALLISON. Repealed it so far as the Senate can. A bill has passed the Senate gathering up all these permanent and indefinite appropriations and requiring annual appropriations to be made for their respective objects. Now, it is proposed to make an indefinite and a continuous annual appropriation of $600,000.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from Iowa will allow me a word. Suppose he suggests an amendment there making it simply an appropriation for the current year. That would obviate his objection.

Mr. ALLISON. I see that this is a bill relating to the reorganization of the militia in the States. Of course I do not wish to interfere with any view the Military Committee may have on that subject; but I think appropriations of money for this purpose ought to be regularly estimated for by the Secretary of War so that we may know what is actually required. This bill, if it is carried out in its spirit will not only cost $600,000 a year but will cost $6,000,000 a year.

Mr. HARRISON. It cannot cost more than the sum appropriated.

Mr. ALLISON. It cannot of course cost more under this bill, but then it provides for tents and equipage and blankets to be furnished.

Mr. HAWLEY. No. Allow me to correct a misapprehension. I think this bill may as well perhaps lie over for further consideration, the Senator who reported it happening to be absent this morning, but I will correct a misapprehension.

This bill appropriates only $600,000 in any contingency; no more can be drawn than that in any year. It is indeed the law of 1808 so far as that is concerned, except as to amount. Each State is entitled to draw its proportion out of the $600,000, but only to draw as it shall be able to exhibit a well-organized and disciplined militia up to the number of six hundred for each Congressional district, so that it is not liable to the objection the Senator makes that the expenditure may go beyond $600,000.

I think, however, that this ought to be an exception to the rule of merely annual appropriations whenever the subject is considered, and if anything shall be adopted of this character it ought to be exceptional, for the reason that we shall not be likely to have military organizations formed and perfected unless they can count upon some permanent policy on the part of the Government. If it be merely an annual appropriation, by the time they have uniformed themselves and hired an armory and become a well-disciplined company or battalion in each Congressional district entitled to draw, the appropriation for the coming year may fail to pass Congress, and so the object of the law for the improvement of the militia would entirely fail. I submit that to the consideration of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations when the matter shall come up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go over without prejudice.

Mr. HAWLEY. I will yield to the suggestion the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] was about to make, that it lie over without prejudice.

Mr. ALLISON. I think this is a matter of too much importance to be considered under the five-minute rule.

Mr. HAWLEY. Let it go over for the present, at any rate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

THE CIVIL SERVICE.

The bill (S. No. 133) to regulate and improve the civil service of the United States was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair supposes the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] does not wish this bill considered now. The report has just been submitted this morning.

Mr. HAWLEY. The report is not yet printed. We ask that it lie over without prejudice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That will be the order.

WESTERN CHEROKEES.

The bill (S. No. 321) to refer the claim of the "Western Cherokees" or "Old Settlers" to the United States Court of Claims for adjudication was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. ALLISON. I should like to look at the bill further, and I ask that it lie over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be passed over.

C. F. BENJAMIN AND H. H. SMITH.

The bill (H. R. No. 3542) for the relief of Charles F. Benjamin and Henry H. Smith was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to Charles F. Benjamin and Henry H. Smith of $250 each, in full compensation for services rendered the Treasury Department in the investigation of the fraudulent claim of Sugg Fort.

Mr. FRYE. I can state what this claim is in a minute. The two gentlemen named here, one the journal clerk of the House, were employed by the Treasury Department to investigate the Sugg Fort claim, so called, in Tennessee, where judgment was recovered for $23,723 against the United States. They were sent there, investigated it thoroughly, obtained the necessary evidence, and the claim was overturned, found to be entirely fraudulent; men were punished who were engaged in the fraud, and the Secretary of the Treasury has recommended that an appropriation be made by Congress of $500 to pay these two men for the services they rendered. Mr. Bristow, the Secretary, and Mr. Bluford Wilson, the Solicitor of the Treasury, recommended it. The House passed it. It was put on an appropriation bill, and by reason of the papers not being filed in time it was dropped by a committee of conference. This bill has now already passed the House as a separate measure.

Mr. INGALLS. Were not these men under pay by the House of Representatives at the same time for which they are now proposed to be paid?

Mr. FRYE. One was the clerk of a committee of the House; of course he would not have been employed during the vacation. Both were clerks of House committees at the time, I think.

Mr. INGALLS. And both received pay from the House of Representatives.

Mr. FRYE. They received pay as committee clerks during the session.

Mr. INGALLS. This proposes to give them additional compensation from the Government for services rendered during the time they were employed by the House of Representatives.

Mr. FRYE. It was not during the session of Congress, but during the vacation.

Mr. INGALLS. Were they under pay at the time?

Mr. FRYE. They were not. They were under pay while they were clerks to the committee, but during the vacation they were not.

Mr. INGALLS. Were they not on annual salaries?

Mr. FRYE. I do not remember whether they had annual salaries or not, but they were not at work on the committee work at this time.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM H. CROOK.

The bill (S. No. 696) for the relief of William H. Crook was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, in line 6, before the word "thousand," to strike out "six" and insert "four;" so as to make the bill read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to William H. Crook, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $4,000, as compensation for services as secretary to the President to sign land-patents for the fiscal years of 1879, 1880, 1881, and 1882, inclusive, and which services were additional to his regular duties as executive clerk and disbursing agent, the amount being the same as was formerly paid for such service.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. Let the report be read.

The Principal Legislative Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. CONGER March 29:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 696) for the relief of William H. Crook, report as follows:

By the act of July 4, 1836, (R. S., sec. 450,) Congress authorized the President to appoint a secretary with the title of "secretary to the President to sign land patents," at a salary of $1,500 per annum. This officer was continued down to 1878, having no other duty imposed upon him except to sign, in the President's name, the patents issued by the Government on the sales and grants of public lands. Under the act above cited this officer, although in name a secretary to the President, was in fact, and was recognized by the law, as an officer of the Land Department, and during the greater part at least of the period above stated he occupied a room and desk in the General Land Office, having no duties to perform and no place at the Executive Mansion.

By act of June 20, 1878, (Statutes, volume 20, page 183,) the appropriation for payment of the salary of this officer was omitted, and the President was directed to designate one of his executive clerks to perform the duty of signing land patents.

Mr. William H. Crook was then, and had been since 1871, an executive clerk, acting as disbursing officer of the Executive Mansion, and also in charge of the reception room. All of these duties he has continued to perform down to the present time. In addition to them he was designated by the President July 1, 1878, as secretary to sign land patents, and since that time all the patents issued on sales and grants of public lands have passed under his hand.

The number of patents issued since July 1, 1878, has averaged about thirty thousand each year and has steadily increased. The labor of the secretary in executing same has been very onerous, each patent having two signatures attached and all having to be checked off and accounted for. On account of his regular duties at the Executive Mansion Mr. Crook has been compelled to perform most of this extra work of signing patents out of office hours; but, notwithstanding this fact, we are assured that the work has been done more promptly and efficiently than when an officer was charged with the performance of this duty alone. In fact Mr. Crook has, in addition to the other duties of his position, since July 1, 1878, performed, without compensation in any form, labor for which from 1836 to 1878 the Government paid $1,500 per annum.

We attach thereto, as exhibits, letters from Hon. J. A. Williamson, late Commissioner of the General Land Office, and Hon. W. K. Rogers, private secretary to President Hayes, both of whom, from their official positions, were familiar with the labor performed by Mr. Crook, and the time and manner of its execution.

It seems to your committee that he is in justice and equity entitled to a fair compensation.

Your committee therefore recommend that the bill be passed with the following amendment, namely: In line 6, strike out the word "six" and insert in lieu thereof the word "four."

WASHINGTON, D. C., September 30, 1881.

SIR: Your note of this date is at hand. I fully agree with you that you should have extra compensation for signing land patents. Before this additional duty was assigned to you the President's secretary to sign land patents was allowed $1,500 a year for that service, and I think the service was worth the amount. The responsibility of the position, in addition to the clerical labor, is very considerable, and should be paid for. I think you are fully entitled to extra compensation, and sincerely hope it may be given you.

Very sincerely, yours,

J. A. WILLIAMSON.

Colonel W. H. CROOK.
Executive Mansion, City.

WASHINGTON, D. C., November 18, 1881.

DEAR SIR: I entirely agree with you that you should receive extra compensation for signing land patents. During the four years while I was private secretary to the President your regular duties as executive clerk and disbursing officer were sufficient to keep you employed all the time during office hours. The additional service you rendered in signing land patents was necessarily performed out of office hours, the greater part of it night-work. Upon the omission by Congress (the act of June 20, 1878) of the usual provision for the salary of the secretary of the President to sign land patents, and the requirement that the President should designate one of the executive clerks to discharge the duties of the office, you were selected by President Hayes because of your familiarity with the work, having temporarily filled the position during the illness of the secretary appointed for the purpose by President Grant. It is a laborious and responsible position, and the work was carefully, diligently, and faithfully performed. I earnestly trust Congress will allow you full compensation for the service rendered.

Very truly, yours,

W. K. ROGERS.

W. H. CROOK,
Executive Clerk to the President.

Mr. ALLISON. I think this bill will set a very bad precedent. By the law of 1878 these duties were devolved upon one of the clerks at the Executive Mansion, with a view of dispensing with an officer in the Land Office. This executive clerk, whom it is proposed now to pay, received an annual salary of $2,000 for his services; and if we allow him now additional compensation for this extra labor, so called, or duty which was imposed upon him by the statute of 1878, there will be no end to this class of cases. We are constantly imposing new duties, or other duties, upon officers of the Government, as, for example, when the census matter came up some years ago, we directed the chief clerk, I think it was, or some other officer of the Interior Department—I do not recollect which one—to act as the disbursing officer of the census fund, and he became such disbursing officer, and undoubtedly performed the duties of the office with great care, skill, and fidelity, and disbursed large sums of money. I know that he has made an application over and over again for compensation for that extra duty imposed upon him; yet we have never allowed that compensation to him because he was receiving a salary of $2,500 or $2,700 for his regular duties.

During 1876, 1877, and 1878 we uniformly appropriated less sums than the law assigned as compensation for officers. We did it, however, with a provision at the end of each bill that the sums appropriated should be accepted in full compensation. But here the statute stands, and if this claim is to be allowed—because it is nothing more or less than a claim for extra compensation—we shall be engaged year after year in allowing other claims of a similar character, until everything saved by these reductions will have been restored. I think it is a very dangerous precedent, and I hope the bill will not be passed.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. President, this officer has performed for four years all the duties of his office at the Executive Mansion, and it was proved to the committee that they were onerous. When the law authorized the President to appoint one of his secretaries to sign land patents, it was contemplated that he should appoint some secretary additional for that office, not one already burdened with all the duties that were required of this officer. He has signed the President's name on an average to thirty thousand patents a year during these four years, and signed them twice, received, counted, and cared for them, and had the whole management of signing the President's name to all the title deeds that were issued by this Government for four years.

Mr. ALLISON. What else has he done?

Mr. CONGER. He has performed the duties which he had performed previously as disbursing officer of the Executive Mansion, the officer in charge of the Mansion. All must know Colonel Crook there, the general officer in charge of the Executive Mansion. He had duties sufficient to occupy his whole time from early morning until late at night; he has probably one of the most laborious positions——

Mr. INGALLS. What is his annual compensation now?

Mr. CONGER. I have understood it was $2,000. The clerk who was appointed up to 1878 received $1,500 a year salary for the performance of this work. The committee thought he ought to have an additional compensation. Instead, however, of giving him the full compensation for that office, the committee recommended an amount equal to two-thirds, or a thousand dollars a year.

After amending this bill by giving $1,000 instead of $1,500 a year, the Committee on Claims agreed unanimously to the bill. In my judgment the labor was performed and additional money was earned. Probably no man either a clerk in the Departments or in Congress has performed more labor during the last four years, and much of it was night-work, after the labors of the day were performed. I think it is an eminently just claim and ought to be allowed by Congress.

Mr. PLUMB. Will the Senator from Michigan allow me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The case goes over until to-morrow, the hour of two o'clock having arrived.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I enter an objection to this case, so that it shall be considered as made now instead of to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill goes over.

Mr. HARRIS. It goes off the Calendar on objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is after two o'clock, and the bill cannot be considered further now.

Mr. HARRIS. The objection carries it off.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. But there may be a motion to consider it notwithstanding the objection.

Mr. CONGER. What do I understand the status of the case to be?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be taken up the first thing in the morning. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS] says he will object to the further consideration of it then; and unless the Senate takes it up it goes to the foot of the Calendar, as it is called.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I have made my objection.

MILITARY LAND WARRANT LOCATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business is the bill (S. No. 67) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to ascertain and certify the amount of land located with military warrants in the States described therein, and for other purposes.

Mr. PLUMB. Before yielding to the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] I wish to say that I shall very much hope the Senate will be ready to vote on this bill to-morrow. I express that hope now with some expectation in the belief that the argument which has heretofore been had need not be largely supplemented, and also in the belief that the friends of the bill will not desire to occupy very much of the time. I speak of this because there has been some struggle for precedence as between different bills on the Calendar which are all of public importance, and I do not desire that this bill shall drag a slow length along, and in any sense impede the progress of the ordinary business of the Senate. Therefore, rather than yield from time to time in order that other measures may be taken up, I shall hope, and express the hope now, that the Senate will consider this bill when once its consideration is commenced formally, with a disposition to get rid of it at the earliest possible moment, and I say now again that I hope to-morrow we shall get a vote on it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] gave notice that he would ask the indulgence of the Senate at this hour.

Mr. PLUMB. I am now willing to yield to the Senator from Kentucky in order that he may make the remarks of which he gave notice.

Mr. BECK. I hope I shall not be interrupted. I have prepared what I propose to say, and will proceed as rapidly as I can.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to say that at the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Kentucky I may desire to occupy the attention of the Senate for a few minutes on the same subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair asks indulgence to lay before the Senate a House bill.

Mr. BECK. I yield for that.

REMAINS OF GENERAL KILPATRICK.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the bill (H. R. No. 6179) directing the Secretary of State to take the necessary steps for the removal of the remains of the late General Kilpatrick, minister to Chili, from Chili to the State of New Jersey for interment.

Mr. McPHERSON. I would ask for the immediate consideration of that bill. I understand the Committee on Foreign Relations are very well satisfied to have action taken without the usual reference.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be read for information.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to know if that has been the custom and rule heretofore, or is this the introduction of a new rule in such cases?

Mr. McPHERSON. I believe it has been done in one or two cases.

Mr. SHERMAN. I know it has been the custom in some cases, because I remember one from Ohio where the remains were brought home from South America.

Mr. McPHERSON. In this case I know that the widow of General Kilpatrick is unable, has not sufficient means, to perform this service herself.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have had occasion to examine the matter in reference to a citizen of my own State who died abroad. It has been the custom, and where it has been done by the family personally the Government has repaid them.

Mr. DAWES. I merely rise to bear testimony to what has been said by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. WILLIAMS.] I think it has been the custom, so far as I remember.

The bill was read three times, and passed.

TAX ON DISTILLED SPIRITS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] will be read.

The Principal Legislative Clerk read the following resolution, submitted by Mr. BECK on the 11th instant:

Whereas all branches of business connected with the production and consumption of distilled spirits are depressed and embarrassed by the uncertainty which prevails relative to the action of Congress on the subject: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Senate will consider and take action on House bill No. 5656, extending the bonded period on distilled spirits, as soon as practicable after the Finance Committee is able to report it.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, being warned by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] and others of the importance of time, and having considered with some care the line of argument I propose to pursue on this matter, I ask not to be interrupted while I am proceeding, because if I am called on to answer interruptions I may take longer time than I care to occupy.

Mr. President, saying nothing in regard to the proposed substitute presented to the Senate this morning by the sub-committee of the Committee on Finance—which I have yet not seen, and which may or may not be approved by the whole committee—further than this, that I will vote for any reasonably liberal proposition if the bill sent to us by the House of Representatives should fail; and waiving for the present all matters which come within the scope of the inquiry directed by the Senate on the resolution of the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM,] I propose to show that the House bill No. 5656 is a just, fair, and honest measure, which if enacted into law would promote the interest alike of the distiller, the dealer, and the Government, by re-establishing the system upon the only principle on which excise taxes can be justly imposed and collected, that is, on consumption.

The bill proposes that the collection of the tax shall not be enforced until the producer or his vendee can find a purchaser who needs his product or goods for consumption, which his interest will always induce, indeed compel him to do as soon as he can; and that the tax shall be collected as near as may be only on the number of gallons which is removed from the custody of the Government officials and placed on the market.

All the other provisions of the bill are mere changes in the administrative machinery now in use, which the extension of the bonded period, or the convenience of the Government and the producers seems to require. I think it is an improvement in many regards on the present method. If, however, there is any belief, or even well founded suspicion, that the proposed changes, or any of them, open the door to fraud, or impair the just safeguards which it is the duty of Congress, as well in the interest of the distillers as of the revenue to throw around this heavily taxed product, no friends of the measure will object to amendments which will, as near as may be, make fraud impossible.

No interest, not even that of the Government, is so deeply concerned in preventing fraud as that of the distillers. Every barrel which evades the tax and is sold to consumers for less than the price at which tax-paid spirits can be sold at a profit is injurious to the honest distiller; and when the fraud is so extensive as to seriously affect prices it is ruinous, as competition when all are dealing fairly has reduced the margin of profit down to the lowest possible point.

Senators may as well dismiss the suspicion at once that any of the advocates of this measure are in the most remote degree, or in any possible contingency, interested in cheating the Government out of a dollar. They are all intensely interested in the most absolute security being given and the most stringent measures consistent with their right to carry on their business being enforced to secure the payment of every cent of tax from every gallon placed upon the market.

The distillers and those to whom they sell in bond are the worst, indeed the only individual sufferers by moonshine, smuggled, or fraudulently-abstracted spirits. The loss to the Government may be serious, but it can be made up otherwise. It is ruinous, however, to all the honest tax-payers in the trade.

This is a plain business proposition, in the investigation and proper solution of which there is neither justice nor propriety in allowing prejudices or partiality to control our action.

Long before any tax was imposed on distilled spirits all the classes of whiskies now produced were manufactured, and then, as now, everybody could carry on the business who chose. Then, as now, certain classes of spirits were produced in different localities. In Pennsylvania, Maryland, and elsewhere rye whisky for table use was the principal product. In Kentucky and Tennessee corn or a mixture of corn and rye whisky, also for table use, was produced largely. In the States of the Northwest high wines, spirits requiring rectification, and alcohol in various degrees of strength formed the main product, and the producers of each in their respective localities had adapted their establishments and machinery to the manufacture of the classes of goods which they thought were most advantageous and profitable.

The necessities of the civil war required onerous, often oppressive, taxation to be imposed in forms to which the people were wholly unaccustomed. Heavy taxes on distilled spirits and tobacco were of course imposed. These were supplemented by taxes on manufactures, on incomes, and on nearly every business and profession. Of course the tax-gatherer and his assistants were unpopular, and it required all the power of Congress to enforce collections. Most of the other impost and excise duties were soon removed, and for a time the whisky tax was so evaded, and fraud was so flagrant and unblushing, that men who obeyed the law and paid their taxes found themselves ruined by the sale of whisky of all grades in open market at prices far below the tax they had paid. Something had to be done or the revenue from that source would soon cease.

As a measure of relief and necessity, the tax was reduced from $2 to fifty cents a gallon in 1868. A new and stringent adjustment of checks and guards was thrown around the business. The tax-paying distiller was ready to consent to anything, and submit to any exaction which bore equally on all, as nothing could be so bad as to be absolutely driven out of the market by whisky which by fraudulent devices was sold for less than the tax. Men engaged legitimately in the business organized themselves in many instances into a detective force to aid the Government officials in detecting and punishing fraud.

Time would fail me if I attempted to set forth in detail the means that were adopted to prevent and detect frauds and evasions of law. It is enough for all the purposes of my argument, and it ought to be regarded as conclusive evidence of the security the Government has that all its taxes will be collected if the present House bill is passed, when I am able to assert, by authority of the Internal Revenue Department, that it is impossible for fraud to be perpetrated on the Government or for whisky to be abstracted or tampered with after the spirits have once been deposited in the distillery warehouse without the absolute certainty of detection, as the history of each package is furnished to the Department at Washington as soon as it reaches the warehouse, and a record of it is so made and kept here that every barrel and every gallon in each barrel must be accounted for, and no collusion or fraud of either the distiller or the Government officials in charge, or of both combined, can be successfully carried out so as to defraud the Government out of any part of its revenue without certain detection.

I am authorized to assert with equal confidence and to challenge contradiction that for the last twelve years there has been no loss to the Government and no attempt at fraud in any form in regard to distilled spirits after they have been deposited in bonded warehouses. All the Saint Louis and other frauds were perpetrated by combinations between officials and distillers before the product reached the warehouses, and were in high-wine distilleries, whose product does not remain in bond, as it does not improve by age.

Senators will, I trust, bear in mind that the modifications of the law proposed by the present bill all relate to whisky in bond and after it gets there. If I am correct in asserting that successful fraud is impossible after the spirits reach the warehouses, and that for twelve years none has been even attempted, as the bill does not propose to interfere with or in any wise impair any of the existing safeguards for its safe deposit in bond, what becomes of the clamor of the Secretary of the Treasury and of the Senator from Minnesota about frauds and rings and combinations to swindle in which they have so lavishly indulged?

I need not argue here how utterly ignorant the present Secretary of the Treasury is in regard to the questions involved in the pending bill. This letter to the Finance Committee, in which he seeks to differ with and contradict the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, is conclusive upon that subject. But some Senators—who I thought knew better—contend that the only security the Government has that the whisky in bond will be properly accounted for is in the integrity of the official in charge of it; and that the greater length of time now sought to be allowed and the assumed or supposed greater accumulation of spirits in bond will be a greater temptation or afford greater facilities or offer greater inducements for him to connive at or commit fraud than now exists. These assumed increases of risks are therefore urged as serious objections to the House bill. I hope to be able to show there is no truth in the position and no warrant for the assumption.

I have stated, and it cannot be denied, because the laws and regulations in my hand prove it, that the books in the Department at Washington contain a history of each barrel deposited from the hour of its deposit more accurate and making its abstraction more difficult than it would be for the officers of a bank to abstract without detection the money of a depositor after they have indorsed the amount received from him on his check-book. It would be far easier for an agent to steal one of fifty branded cattle out of a barn without detection, when he had receipted for that number, than for a barrel of whisky to be stolen out of a warehouse without detection after it was recorded in Washington as deposited there.

Men who seek to perpetrate fraud necessarily consider the chances and consequences of detection. In this matter the chances are one hundred to one against them. Under existing laws and regulations, which the bill does not propose to alter, the Government can change its storekeepers and gaugers every day. It can from its records in Washington furnish its new officials with an exact list and description of each of the barrels in any warehouse, the contents of each, and the proof of the spirits they contain. It can at any time require the distiller at his own expense to take from his racks each barrel, so that it may be examined, regauged, and compared with the original record of entry; and if at any time any fraud is discovered, if any packages are missing, if the proof shows that whisky has been abstracted and water substituted, confiscation of all this property of the distiller is the penalty, and he is subjected to fine and imprisonment almost without limit.

The distiller has to own in fee-simple, free from incumbrance, all the real estate on which the distillery and the warehouses are built. On that, with all the buildings, fixtures, and machinery, often costing hundreds of thousands of dollars, the Government has a first lien. He has to give bond, with approved surety, for an amount equal to the value of the tax on the spirits. The bill proposes to modify that bond, it is true. I will speak of that hereafter. All the whisky in the warehouse, however large the amount, in addition to the distillery premises and the bond, is seized whenever fraud is developed, and the owner goes to the penitentiary.

Will any reasonable man assume, or even suspect, that any distiller will ever attempt to commit a fraud on the revenue or combine with any officials for that purpose, with such chances against him and such penalties hanging over him? I consider such an assumption simply an absurdity, and the fact that the records of the Department show that such an attempt has not even been made since 1869, is answer conclusive to all suggestions which the opponents of this bill may seek to make upon that subject.

The Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM,] in his assault on this bill some time ago, used the following language:

> I believe this thing ought to be inquired into further, because this bill presents opportunities for the operation of a whisky ring which will pale into utter insignificance the whisky ring of a few years ago. I believe that if this bill pass, this country will within the next two or three years be shocked by the development and operation of a whisky ring in comparison with which the former one will be utterly insignificant. There are $67,000,000 now owing to the Government for taxes on whisky in bond, and this bill proposes in substance to relieve the ring from the inconvenience of those bonds, and give it an opportunity to raid upon that immense sum of Government money. I am informed that money has been raised to carry that thing through. I know nothing personally of the truth of this charge, but I want the Senate to investigate it, and let us go to the bottom of it.

I confess that statement amazed me. I was not astonished at the statement of the present Secretary of the Treasury; I knew that he did not know anything about it; but I thought the late Secretary did. I know of no illustration more simple or more conclusive by which to show the absurdity of the position assumed by the Secretary of the Treasury and repeated on this floor by the late Secretary, now a Senator from Minnesota, that the United States has a present vested right to the tax of 90 cents a gallon on, say, 76,000,000 gallons of distilled spirits now in bonded warehouses, than that furnished by the present law relative to the export trade. If the owners of that 76,000,000 gallons of whisky should now or at any time before three years from the time it was placed in the bonded warehouses conclude that they could make more money by sending it to England, France, or Germany, than they would by paying the tax and selling it here, they can export it, and the Government would not receive a dollar of revenue, yet the Government would not lose a cent by its being exported; indeed it would be benefited by its citizens having found a foreign market for so much of our surplus grain, converted for the sake of economy and cheap transportation into whisky. Indeed all the whisky now in bond might burn up to-night and the Government would not lose a dollar for the same reason. Production would go on, and will always be equal to home consumption; the problem is now but to keep down production to the quantity required. That being true, what foundation is there for the clamor—I was about to say the pretense—that can only be excused on the assumption of ignorance, that the Government has any absolute or accrued right to a tax on any portion of the whisky product of the country except that which enters into home consumption?

I supposed that all reasonably well-informed men knew that it depends entirely upon the interest of the producer whether his product enters into home consumption and, therefore, pays the tax, or is exported and pays no tax. The right to export, tax free, illustrates and proves that the tax is not, and was not intended to be, a tax on the production of spirits, but was imposed as an excise on domestic consumption. Any other form of taxation on this product when nearly every other product was untaxed would have been invalid under the following provisions of the Constitution of the United States:

> All duties, imposts and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.
> * * * * * * *
> No capitation, or other direct tax shall be laid, unless in proportion to the census or enumeration hereinbefore directed to be taken.
> No tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any State.

The courts have held that a tax on real property according to value is the only direct tax other than the capitation tax that can be constitutionally imposed, and that the only uniform mode of excise or indirect taxation is upon products put upon the market for consumption, whereby each consumer should pay the same tax as every other in proportion to the amount of the taxed product consumed. That principle is clearly violated when a tax is exacted from the producer on the quantity necessarily lost by evaporation between the time of manufacture and sale. The true principle is now, and has always been, maintained in regard to tobacco in all forms of its manufacture, from the time the tax was first imposed through all the changes in the rate of taxation. The tobacco manufacturer may hold his product one, two, or ten years without payment of tax; he pays his tax only when he can sell and only on what he sells. The same provisions exist in regard to the manufacture and sale of beer, which is the only other taxed product.

By the act of July 1, 1862, when the excise tax on distilled spirits was first imposed, the tax was 20 cents a gallon. The producer was required to pay only when he could sell, and only on the quantity put upon the market. The same provisions were made in the act of March 7, 1864, when the tax was increased to 60 cents a gallon, and by the act of June 30, 1864, when it was increased to $1.50 per gallon, and by the act of December 22, 1864, which increased the tax to $2 per gallon after January 1, 1865. The act of July 13, 1866, made no change in the rate of tax, or in the conditions or terms of its payment; but it allowed all sorts of transfers from warehouse to warehouse for rectification and other purposes, under which, during the general demoralization which prevailed while President Johnson and Congress were at cross purposes, if not at war, frauds were committed which had perhaps better be forgotten than exposed. Distillers who paid $2 a gallon tax were met in open market with so-called tax-paid whisky, precisely like their own, offered publicly at $1.50, when the actual cost of the product, tax-paid, could not possibly be less than $2.30.

Bonds for double the amount of whisky produced were required during all that time, but fraudulent combinations of officials and others broke down all legal provisions till the revenue dwindled to less than $14,000,000 a year, and all men who obeyed the law were compelled to close up their distilleries, forfeit their contracts, dispose of the cattle and hogs which they were feeding with their slops, and abandon the business in which they had invested all they were worth, and which they, and in many instances their fathers before them, had struggled to build up; bankruptcy and ruin stared them all in the face, especially as they knew that what General Schenck, then the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, declared in his place to be true, that more than 90 per cent. of all the frauds committed were perpetrated by the direct cooperation or connivance of the Government officials. Of course, any change was a relief to the distiller. Senators may not realize the sacrifice required to close up an extensive distillery. A well-selected and properly constructed establishment, with fire-proof buildings and warehouses, including machinery capable of producing 100 barrels a day, would cost at least $150,000, and it is useless for any other purpose.

Contracts for grain and its prompt delivery have to be made months, perhaps more than a year, in advance. At least 1,500 cattle or 5,000 hogs are daily fed from the slops of many large distilleries, the profits arising from this item being often all the margin of profit in the business. It will be readily seen, even from this imperfect statement, how ruinous the sudden stoppage of such a business must necessarily be. The men engaged in it when those conditions prevailed were not Vanderbilts or Jay Goulds; they were generally energetic farmers or business men of moderate means, working largely on credit. They were, of course, crushed by the system of frauds so extensively and unblushingly carried on by Government officials and other swindlers.

Congress saw the situation, and reduced the tax from $2 to 50 cents a gallon; placed every safeguard against frauds around the business that human ingenuity could devise; the grain to be used was weighed and measured; mash-tubs were adjusted and their fermenting periods limited; the system of stamps and brands was perfected; the gauger and storekeeper had to brand and stamp every barrel with its serial number its contents, and the proof of the spirits it contained, and a complete history of each package had to be made out and sent for record to the Department at Washington; the capacity of the distillery was ascertained and recorded; the spirits so branded were rolled from the worm or receiving cistern directly into a bonded, generally a fire-proof, warehouse and locked up in charge of a bonded Government official, so that the owner could only enter it in his presence. Perhaps the best protection after all to the producer was that the war or strife between Congress and the President closed; the various branches of the public service commenced to work in harmony; the shamelessness of the frauds made the President and Congress careful in the selection of officials, and the business of producing spirits once more became a legitimate occupation and an important source of revenue, nearly $40,000,000 being paid annually into the Treasury under the fifty-cent tax, while only $14,000,000 was paid under the tax of $2 a gallon.

I have only glanced at the wrongs and oppressions of that period and at some of the remedies that had to be resorted to to correct them. The distillers, as I said, had to submit to anything; indeed, were compelled to agree to anything, as without relief in some form they were ruined.

Coupled with these beneficial, but stringent measures, was the change in the basis of taxation, which the House bill seeks to rectify. Producers of whisky were for the first time required to pay the tax on the whole quantity that was deposited in their warehouses and pay it within a year from the date of deposit, whether they had made sale of it or not, regardless of the quantity that, by well known laws inherent to distilled spirits, had evaporated during the period of its deposit in bond. That was plainly and palpably wrong; but Congress, necessarily ignorant of the details of the business and justly incensed at the loss of revenue and the degradation of the public service while dealing with such gigantic frauds, determined to stand on the simple proposition of collection of the tax on all spirits that left the worm. It had given great relief by reduction of the tax and by the many safeguards it had thrown around the business. The new system was an experiment rather than an assured success for a time; and the distillers submitted to that mode of taxation, as indeed they would have submitted to anything which averted the ruin which the frauds under the $2 tax had brought upon them.

Experience soon proved that when spirits were once fairly and honestly deposited in the warehouse and the history of each package was written on the books of the Commissioner at Washington, all temptation and opportunity for successful fraud was at an end, and none has occurred since 1869, as I said before, in regard to goods once bonded. It has always been admitted that nothing short of an imperative necessity to prevent fraud can ever justify the imposition of taxes on what does not and cannot possibly exist, as is now done, because evaporation and absorption by barrels is inherent to the very nature of distilled spirits. When fraud ceases, this unjust tax of course ought to be taken off. That being conceded, Congress had no difficulty after it was satisfied that frauds had ceased in extending the bonded period from one to three years, first requiring interest for time given and afterward not only striking it off but allowing a regauge when bonded spirits were removed and put upon the market, taxing, as nearly as could be done by a general rule or regulation, only what entered into consumption, the maximum shrinkage allowance being about what experience had shown would naturally take place; yet no fraud has been perpetrated or attempted under the system as thus liberalized.

The present House bill is only an extension of the present system with all its checks and guards maintained. It has the unanimous approval of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives, as shown by the report of Mr. DUNNELL, of Minnesota, (see House report No. 811,) and is fully indorsed by the honorable Commissioner of Internal Revenue, whose long experience, absolute knowledge of the working of the system, and known fidelity in maintaining and protecting all the rights and interests of the Government, is the best assurance possible both of the justice and integrity of the bill.

All the conditions have changed since 1869–'70. What was then an experiment is now a perfected system.

Whatever might have been said in 1868 of the men and the officials who composed the fraudulent whisky rings, it can now be truthfully said, and all the banks in the country will certify to the fact, that the men who are engaged in the production of distilled spirits will compare favorably in intelligence, in integrity, and in the strict and honorable performance of all their obligations, with any other equal number of men engaged in any business. They have paid since 1868 as taxes for the support of the Government about seven hundred million dollars. I doubt whether as large a sum was ever collected in any form by taxation in this or any other country in the same time from a single source with as little evasion or fraud as this vast sum has been. They deserve liberal treatment now when the Government can not only well afford but owes it as a duty to the people to be liberal and lighten the burdens of taxation.

Times have changed since 1868 in other regards. Then the public debt was over $2,700,000,000. Now it is less than $1,700,000,000. Then the annual interest required to be paid was over $150,000,000. Now it is less than $58,000,000. Then, and several times since, our revenues were insufficient to meet current obligations and provide for the sinking fund. This year we are paying off, say, $156,000,000 of the principal of the public debt to creditors who do not want to be paid. We have to-day less than $500,000,000 of bonds outstanding that we can or have a right to pay before 1891. At the present rate of taxation they will be all paid off before 1886. Why then, I ask, should we, the representatives of the tax-paying people, seek to oppress the men who have contributed so largely, so cheerfully, and so honestly to reduce our debt to its present proportions and thus elevate our national credit so high at home and abroad?

But, apart from all questions of liberality or justice, what sense or propriety is there in requiring men to pay enormous taxes on their products before they can sell them or in driving them into bankruptcy by a forced sale for taxes, at a time when the Treasury is overflowing, when the market is overstocked, and the spirits, if sold by the Government for taxes, would not enter into consumption, but be held by the purchasers at these sales till needed, and thus compete with, if it did not stop, further production? The Government can only collect its revenues steadily and successfully for any considerable period from spirits, or anything else, when it allows the men engaged in the business to remain reasonably prosperous. Its annual receipts from taxation for, say, five years must be regulated and controlled by the annual consumption. If by forced sales it obtains taxes any one year on more than is consumed, that tax-paid product will compete with and curtail next year's production, as demand will necessarily regulate supply. Men can better afford to remain idle or divert their capital and energies into some other channel than to carry on a losing business. That is the condition of things we are now dealing with.

There are over 70,000,000 gallons of a character of whisky now in bond the annual consumption of which does not exceed 20,000,000 gallons, and more is being produced every day. To force out the surplus ruins the holder, and, so far from benefiting the Government, which does not need the taxes for its support, injures and dwindles in the near future the revenue to obtain which the tax was imposed.

Apprehension is gravely expressed by the opponents of the bill lest the present overproduction will be increased if the bill becomes a law. I know of no better answer than that made by the honorable Commissioner of Internal Revenue in his report on this measure to the Secretary. I adopt it. He says:

> To my mind it seems clear that the production of fine whisky during the past two years was in excess of the demands of the trade for consumption. I should think that this matter would soon be regulated by the ordinary laws of supply and demand, and that manufacturers would not produce this article in quantities which could not find a ready market.

And he might have added with equal force that all apprehension as to the manufacture of large amounts to be stored away, merely because men have the privilege of keeping it in bond, is equally groundless, as the owners of it will always sell whenever they can obtain a fair price for it. They will be forced to do so by competition, and the necessity to obtain means to carry on their business. Prices never rise or increase, even on the best or oldest whiskies, when the market is oversupplied. That is an unvarying rule. More money has been lost by holders of old high-priced whisky than on any other, so that all the talk about overproduction and continuous holding need not alarm anybody.

Congress is not the guardian of the people. The laws we pass look only to revenue. We do not legislate either to control the business or regulate the morals of men. All branches of the business of distillation of spirits were, I repeat, in existence and had been carried on for many years before the excise laws of 1862 or any subsequent acts were passed. Each branch of the business was open to everybody everywhere, and it is so now. The presumption is that each man made the kind of spirits he found most profitable in his locality. The Pennsylvania distiller would have made high wines if he had found it more profitable than to produce rye whisky.

The Peoria distiller then could and now can manufacture so-called Bourbon whisky if he chooses, and the Kentucky distiller can and always could make either of the other kinds of spirits. There was and is in that regard no monopoly, protection, patent, or privilege. Before the imposition of the tax each kept his product as long as he pleased, sold when he could, and produced as much as he thought he could make money out of. Congress did not assume to exercise any paternal authority or seek to pass laws to protect any of them against overproduction any more than it does to protect the manufacturers of blankets, Bessemer steel, or anything else against overproduction. All Congress undertook to do when it imposed the excise tax was to assume that the consumer of distilled spirits was a proper person to be required to furnish needed revenues to the Government, and it passed laws requiring him to do so. It did not assume any paternal relation to the distiller further than to see that all the product of each which entered into consumption paid the tax, as it would have been manifest injustice to have imposed the burden upon the honest and allowed the dishonest to drive them out of the market. The business, whether it was Bourbon, rye, or high wines, which the producers of each had voluntarily selected as the most profitable form of production to him, was not sought to be interfered with. The present House bill proposes nothing else than to return, now that it can be done with propriety and safety, to the original purpose of the excise laws, and allow the producers of spirits the right to hold their products under Government supervision till they can sell them, and then pay the tax when they are put upon the market, and pay upon what is offered to the consumer and not on what does not exist.

There has been beyond question a large overproduction of spirits for table uses, and of high wines as well, in the last few years. Perhaps the extension of the bonded period and the allowances for natural shrinkage while in bond had something to do with it; so had the laws we passed lately to encourage the export trade. But the general prosperity of the country and the boom in prices of all products had a much greater influence than all these combined. After five or six years of general depression, business sprang up in 1879–'80 with unexampled rapidity; enormous agricultural products were sent abroad and money flowed from other countries to this; men sought investments in everything that promised reasonable returns; interest on money became so low that capitalists were not content with that form of investment. Whisky, now reasonably secure from fraudulent competition, promised large returns under liberalized legislation; men of means went to distillers of good reputation in Kentucky, Pennsylvania, and elsewhere, whose well-known brands were a guarantee of ready sale, and engaged all they could make, paying the manufacturer a liberal price and assuming the payment of the Government tax. Of course distillers made all they could. Very many of the best distillers in Kentucky whose warehouses are now full of spirits in bond do not own a gallon, and have not for years paid a cent of tax to the Government.

No individual could tell how much was being produced by others or what the annual consumption of that class of spirits would be; still the present glut in the market might have been worked off in great part, at least, without serious loss, but for circumstances over which neither the distiller nor his customers had any control. Knowing that the present taxation was producing revenue far beyond the wants of the Government and that a reduction of taxes in some form was reasonably certain, the men interested in the continuance of a high protective tariff met in convention last fall, first at Chicago and then in New York, and resolved to maintain a protective tariff, as they said, in the interest of the American laborer. They pledged themselves to reduce the tax on whisky and tobacco. The association of distillers indorsed their views in that regard, and all these combined interests took steps at once to obtain the necessary legislation.

The power and influence of the protected interests was well known to dealers all over the country; and a large reduction of excise taxes was confidently expected. Of course not only all purchases for speculation in whisky ceased at once but all contracts for future production that could be, were, on some terms or other, rescinded; dealers, large and small, no longer bought supplies except from hand to mouth; they could not afford to be caught with any more stock on hand than they could help, on which they had paid 90 cents a gallon when the reduction to 50 cents, which was expected to take place at an early day, should occur; in short, the trade was paralyzed by agitation, for which leading members of Congress are largely responsible; and unless relief is given by some such measure as the bill of the House proposes, many good men will soon be bankrupts.

Am I asked why the distillers are so much interested if they have sold so much of their product? The answer is obvious. If their customers fail or cannot sell, their production must cease; if goods not needed for consumption are forced on the market to pay Government taxes, they have that large surplus waiting for a demand to compete with in all their future operations. They have a large and costly distillery property on hand, useless for any other purpose, which must remain idle; their laborers must be discharged; the cattle and hogs fed from their slop must be sold, or contracts to feed them forfeited; they dare not make contracts for grain in advance. If they run at all, it must be on a limited scale and under great disadvantages, so that it will be readily perceived that they are intensely interested in the extension of time asked for, even if they do not own a barrel of the whisky now in bond; and the Government is greatly interested; it cannot afford to kill the goose that lays the golden egg.

I would not care to say more, but the Secretary of the Treasury has undertaken to contradict the Commissioner of Internal Revenue in regard to the effect and operation of the bill, and to advise Congress not to pass it. The position he occupies, rather than the views he presents or the reasons he gives, requires a brief notice of some of his positions. He is a good lawyer, doubtless thoroughly honest in his convictions, and desirous of protecting the revenues of the Government; his opinions are valuable in regard to any matter that he is informed about; but as to this business, he is, in my opinion, absolutely ignorant. It is likely that some outsider, or some clerk in some of his bureaus, scared him about a whisky ring.

He assumes that "the bill legalizes the forestalling of a chief product," and adds: "Forestalling of products was an offense at common law. It is one of the serious evils of the present day." In its application to this measure that statement seems to me to be the sheerest nonsense. For more than half a century before this tax was imposed distillers of whisky of every grade made all they could sell, kept it as long as they pleased, and regulated their production by the law of supply and demand, as every other producer of every other product, tobacco and beer included, does now. Purchasers of every grade of distilled spirits bought all they pleased and kept them or disposed of them as their interests dictated, and nobody ever suspected that either class was guilty of "forestalling" the market, or of any other offense at common law. That is all the bill proposes now to allow. Think of the absurdity of a market being forestalled when it is glutted, and 70,000,000 gallons, or nearly four years' supply, are held and kept in bond because consumers cannot be found to buy it.

Again, the Secretary in one sentence says that the privilege of holding for a long time and paying tax only on what goes into consumption so enhances the value of the taxed goods as to give an undue advantage to the producers and owners of spirits that improve by age over those that do not, and, therefore, do not ask or need extension; and in another breath he argues that there is great danger that the value of the spirits held in bond will be so depreciated by accumulation that they will have to be sold for the tax and will not sell for enough to pay it. That assumption is so preposterous that I had best read the language of the Secretary to prove that I do not misstate his position. He says:

> Nor is the lien upon the spirits stored a sufficient security in case of great accumulation of the article. The amount of the tax is so much greater than the prime value of the spirits that when, in case of a general failure to pay the tax, the Government should be forced to put the spirits upon the market there would be a glut, and the spirits would fail to bring enough to give the Government its revenue. If the bid does not equal the tax the officials must bid in for the Government; but the Government cannot hold the spirits as its own for length of time, and when it shall try to realize by other sale free from tax it may find it impossible to realize the amount of the lien.

To begin with, the spirits under existing law when sold by the Government must bring the amount of the tax and a new tax-paid stamp must be affixed. The Government officials are not allowed to buy in and hold spirits. Of course the Secretary knows nothing about any of these things; but, waiving that, let us look at the proposition in a common sense, business way.

At least two-thirds of all the spirits annually produced are in the form of cologne spirits, alcohol, or high wines, which are worth as much when they leave the still as they ever are. They cost the producer, say, $1.15 a gallon to produce them. Does any sane man believe that the distillers who produce this class of spirits would continue to produce at these rates and stand by and see the Government sell three, five, or eight years old Bourbon or rye whiskies, ordinarily worth $2.50 or $3.00 per gallon at those ages, to other people for less than 90 cents to compete with their high wines, when their inferior product cannot be taken from the still for less than $1.15 of actual outlay? The bare statement of the case makes argument superfluous. When I read that sentence in the letter of the Secretary I could not help feeling that the Senator who knew least about the whisky trade was a Solomon compared to him in regard to it, and thinking how useless it was for a committee as intelligent as that on finance to be referring such matters to the Secretary for information to guide them in framing legislation. His attempt to parade the policy pursued in regard to imported goods held in bond as analogous to domestic products is equally unsound though more plausible.

Under our tariff system all duties are properly payable before goods leave the custom-house. Uniformity of taxation on imports, which I believe all men now admit is a tax on consumption, requires all importers to be taxed equally.

If A, an importer, brings $100,000 worth of goods from Europe and pays $45,000 tariff tax at once, and B, his competitor in business, brings $100,000 of precisely similar goods from the same port, but instead of paying $45,000 into the Treasury as A does, places them in a bonded warehouse, justice to his competitor A requires that there should be a limit to his privilege of holding in bond, which in that case is a matter of grace and not of right, and that he should pay interest for the time allowed, as A has paid cash with which, perhaps, the Government has paid off its outstanding bonds. Excise taxes levied on a domestic product, especially when all other domestic products are exempt from like taxation, stands on a very different footing, and should be levied only on what enters into consumption, and the tax should be paid only when it does so.

I have already spoken of the fallacy of the assumption that the tax is necessarily owing or payable to the Government when spirits are deposited in a bonded warehouse. They may be deposited for export, or the owner may at any time determine to export them. In that event the only interest the Government has in them is to see that they are in good faith exported, and are not allowed to be put upon the home market in competition with tax-paid goods. This is an obligation the Government owes to the tax-paying home distiller. The language of the Secretary in this regard is as follows:

> The amount of accumulation now is about seventy-five millions of gallons, according to data and estimates. The tax on this, owing but not yet payable, is over sixty-seven millions of dollars. It surely is an amount to be saved to the country, and presents a reason for care and scrutiny in legislation.

I have already said that neither the export nor the destruction of all the goods now in bond would result in loss to the Government nor in a diminution of its revenues. Nothing but the imposition of goods fraudulently upon the home market in competition with the producer who pays the tax honestly interferes with or curtails the revenues of the Government. Production will always keep pace with consumption and fully supply the market, as the capacity to produce distilled spirits is only limited by the corn and rye crop of the country, which is practically illimitable, while consumption is necessarily limited; and the 90 cents tax as compared with a 50 cents tax limits consumption at least 40 per cent. below what it would be at the lower rate of taxation.

But there is another right which the owners of whisky have, of which the Secretary does not seem to be aware, which, while it is costly and men should not be forced by law to adopt it, absolutely protects them against the seizures and sales for the tax, or less than the tax, which seems to weigh so heavily on the mind of the Secretary. Owners of bonded whisky can under existing laws not only export their product to foreign countries but they can bring it back again to this country after keeping it abroad as long as they please, if they can find a country that will allow them to keep it, and only pay 90 cents a gallon on the quantity they bring back, thus getting full allowance for shrinkage, and if, in the mean time, the tax has been reduced from 90 cents to 50 cents, or taken off altogether, they get the benefit of the reduction, or land their spirits as free goods, though whisky made abroad pays $2 per gallon tax; and they can still further extend the time by placing the spirits so reimported in bonded customs warehouses for three years, one year without cost and the other two by paying 10 per cent., so that the goods now in bond may yet be consumed in this country, even if the House bill does not pass, and pay no tax whatever. With all these rights and privileges under existing law, it is absurd for any official or Representative to abuse this bill or talk about the owners of spirits standing by and allowing their costly goods to be sold for the tax, or less than the tax. I do not suppose anybody believes that except the Secretary of the Treasury and one Representative from Kentucky. Whether the Secretary caught his notions from the Representative or the Representative caught his inspiration from the Secretary, I neither know nor care. But any Senator who will take the trouble to read section 2500 of the Revised Statutes will see that my statements as to the rate of taxation on reimported domestic goods are absolutely correct. Whisky produced abroad and imported pays now $2 per gallon. While our reimported article would now pay 90 cents on the actual number of gallons brought back. Under Treasury regulations prior to October 19, 1881, internal-revenue stamps were affixed to domestic products reimported. Since then, by like order, a special stamp has been affixed, but the tax remains at 90 cents per gallon as before.

One of the objections to this bill which at first blush seems plausible is that as high wines do not improve in value by being held in bond, therefore the corn and rye whiskies which do improve, as many claim, very rapidly, will have an undue advantage over the high-wine product. There is, however, really nothing in it. They are used in great part for wholly different purposes and do not compete; besides, as far as they do, many of the old bonded goods are owned and used by producers of high wines, cologne, and other spirits to compound with their products, and the production of each class of goods is open to all, each producer judging for himself which class it is the most profitable for him to produce. The same man may, as some do, produce both and hold one to blend with the other so as to make both profitable. Individual interest and competition regulate that. There can be no corner in an overstocked market or on a product that can be rapidly produced without limit. The Government does not care whether its revenue comes out of one, two, or three barrels so it reaches all that is offered for consumption.

But there can be no such thing as equality in specific taxation, whether it is a pound, gallon, or yard tax, or whether it is imposed under tariff or excise laws. The commonest and cheapest cigars now pay precisely the same duty as the finest and most costly; one may be worth $1 per hundred and the other $10. The poorest and coarsest manufactured tobacco pays 16 cents a pound, while the finest and highest-priced, worth four times as much, pays no more. The poorest of the laboring population use the cheapest tobacco and cigars, of course, yet there seems to be no complaint of inequality in regard to the cigar and tobacco tax, unequal as it is, on the part of the objectors to the present bill. The finest sherry and Madeira wines imported into this country, often costing $4 or $5 a gallon, only pay a tax of 40 cents a gallon, while the cheapest Rhine and other wines which laboring people use, and which cost 40 cents or 50 cents a gallon, pay a tax of 40 cents. Our own whisky product, whether good or bad, dear or cheap, pays 90 cents a gallon.

All I ask is that the tax on home manufactured spirits shall be paid as it is on tobacco, cigars, wines, and beer, when it goes into consumption, and on what actually goes upon the market, as is the case with every other taxed article.

Perhaps the objection which has impressed the popular mind more forcibly than any other against the bill is the proposed reduction and modification of the bonds required for the security of the payment of the tax on bonded goods, and yet there is nothing in it. I care nothing about these changes, and am willing to vote for amendments allowing the bonds to remain as they are, if the Secretary or anybody else thinks that the present condition is better than the proposed change. I regard the whisky deposited in the warehouses as ample security for the tax; indeed, if half that is said as to the rapidity with which its value increases is true, there is no propriety in demanding more. Every unnecessary act which the taxpayer is required to perform is that much time, labor, and money lost. When everybody engaged in producing spirits was treated as though he was of course a thief, bonds were required to be given every ten days in an amount equal to double the value of the tax on the whisky deposited. As soon as the business was arranged on something like fair business principles, that was found to be useless, oppressive, and annoying.

It required nearly all the time of distillers, who lived say thirty or forty miles from the collector's office, to go every ten days with their sureties and give bonds for their whisky held by Government officials. (I am informed that there has not even been a suit brought on one of these bonds for twelve years, and the Government has not had to call on any surety on any of them to pay a dollar.) The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, recognizing the useless, I might say oppressive, nature of these bonds, recommended a reduction of them from double the amount of the tax to the actual amount, and an extension of time from ten to thirty days, which is the present law. Even that has proved useless, and now the Commissioner consents to an annual instead of a monthly bond, and to a still further reduction of the amount of the obligation. The extension from one month to twelve months is of course a great convenience, and greatly increases the security of the Government if any more is thought to be needed, and for this reason: suppose the monthly bond is $25,000; the two sureties required need jointly not be worth more than $25,000; the same men can and often do become sureties on each monthly bond of a distiller for a year, so that under the present law the Government has only in fact surety worth $25,000 on bonds for $300,000. As proposed in the present bill, if the average annual bond is only for 50 per cent. of the $300,000 of annual tax, say $150,000, the joint sureties must be worth that amount, so that the Government has in fact surety for $150,000 on the annual amount of tax, instead of $25,000 as now, (twelve times repeated on paper,) yet the Secretary and his clacquers denounce the proposed change to be a stupendous fraud, which is intended to overthrow the internal-revenue system.

But, as I said, I care but little about that part of the bill. The hue and cry about bonds made by the Secretary and others show that they are absolutely ignorant of the practical working of the business. The spirits are and always will be ample security for the tax, and the longer they are kept the more valuable they are and the better security they become. Indeed, on fair business principles, when the Government takes possession of a man's spirits which he has produced at his own expense and places them in the hands of one of its own officials, it ought to give him good security for the safe custody and return of the property it has taken, instead of requiring him to give bond and security for his own property which it has taken from him to be held in the interest of its revenue. However, the Secretary may write the bonds in any form he pleases, so he prevents fraud; that is what the distiller dreads more than all else, because he cannot compete in the market with whisky which evades the tax.

Mr. Lorillard, though he may hold manufactured tobacco on which the taxes may be $4,000,000, cannot now be required to give a bond for over $20,000, and there is no Government official placed in charge of his goods; yet, with all the other safeguards thrown around distilled spirits, men are denounced as thieves who seek reasonable relief from oppressive and useless bonds. Many good men are unable to call upon millionaires every month to become their sureties. The Commissioner knows that, and therefore approves this change. There is only one other feature in the bill, and that is in regard to the establishment of special bonded warehouses within the collection district in which distilled spirits are produced into which all spirits produced at any distillery which has been discontinued permanently or suspended for a year shall be removed when the quantity does not exceed 4,000 proof gallons, and into which any distiller may transfer his product from the distillery warehouse under such regulations as the officers of the Treasury may prescribe. That these provisions are all in the interest of the Government and of the small distillers is so apparent that it would seem to be necessary only to read what the Commissioner of Internal Revenue says in regard to them to satisfy every Senator that they ought to be enacted into law. The Commissioner says:

SPECIAL WAREHOUSES.

The establishment and use of special bonded warehouses, as provided for in the second and other sections of the bill, is a feature which I think can properly be looked upon with favor. These warehouses would no doubt be established by men of means and business standing, at important points of trade, where transportation would be easy, and would be constructed as nearly as possible fire-proof. To these warehouses would be sent, by direction of the Commissioner, under section 3272, United States Revised Statutes, the spirits in warehouses which were deemed insecure, and, under the provisions of the present bill, the spirits in warehouses where the distilleries had been suspended for a year and upward. To them would also be taken, on the application of the distiller, the spirits produced at small establishments, remote from railroad or other important lines of transportation, to the great advantage of the small manufacturers, who would thus be enabled to insure their goods at low rates, to obtain loans upon their warehouse receipts without difficulty, and to deliver their goods, when sold, to their customers without unnecessary delay in transportation. These warehouses would be under the control of the collectors and in the custody of storekeepers, and in my opinion the interests of the Government, as well as the convenience of the trade, would be promoted by their establishment.

In conclusion I will state that, in my opinion, the provisions of the bill extending the bonded period, allowing leakage, and authorizing the establishment of bonded warehouses, are judicious, and will work beneficially to the Government, the manufacturers, and the trade, and I think that the proposition of an annual warehouse bond is a good one. The proposed reduction of the penal sum of the warehousing bonds may be considered as endangering the interests of the Government. I venture the opinion that if Congress in its wisdom sees fit to adopt this branch of the bill it can be administered so as to protect the interests of the Government.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully,

GREEN B. RAUM,
Commissioner.

Notwithstanding that emphatic indorsement by the officer who above all others knows what will be the effect of the proposed change in the existing law, men who ought to know better have professed, or pretended to see in this change a "Pandora's box," from which all the frauds of 1868 will be again let loose upon the country. I fail to see how any frauds are possible under the carefully guarded provisions of the bill. Let me explain why: under existing law (see section 3272 of the Revised Statutes) the Commissioner has now the power to make nearly all the changes from one distillery warehouse to another which these provisions require in regard to special bonded warehouses. That section reads thus:

SEC. 3272. Whenever in the opinion of the Commissioner of the Internal Revenue any distillery or other warehouse is unsafe or unfit for use, or the merchandise therein is for any reason liable to loss or great wastage, he may discontinue such warehouse, and require the merchandise therein to be transferred to such other warehouse as he may designate and within such time as he may prescribe. Such transfer shall be made under the supervision of the collector, or of such other officer as may be designated by the Commissioner, and the expense thereof shall be paid by the owner of the merchandise.

No frauds have been committed in the execution of the provisions of that law.

It will be observed that under the provisions of that section the Commissioner is not limited in making changes from one distillery warehouse to another, to warehouses within the same collection district, (as the bill of the House provides;) and it is not well, when it is so important to keep a perfect history of each package, to have it leave the district in which it was manufactured until after the tax is paid; nor is it well to require or compel one distiller to store his product in a warehouse owned exclusively by one of his competitors. The whole object of the bill in that regard may be stated plainly in this way: small distilleries in the country are often located at points remote from railways or other means of transportation; their warehouses are, of course, small and insecure. If their product can be insured at all, it must be at exorbitant rates. If propositions for the purchase of their goods are made, they are generally made on condition that delivery shall be prompt. Country roads at certain seasons are often in such bad condition that the hauling of loads, if practicable at all, entails great expense, perhaps consumes the profits, whereas if the goods were in a fire-proof warehouse at some railroad center in the district, the insurance would be nominal, the delivery could be prompt, the hauling could be done when country roads were good, and in every way the distiller would be benefited.

The advantage to the Government is obvious. One storekeeper in a special fire-proof warehouse at a railroad point could guard the product of twenty little distilleries, better than twenty men now do at the little distillery log warehouses at the heads of the creeks, where they now cost us $3 or $4 a day to watch, or pretend to watch, a few kegs. Under existing law, if the contents of a bonded warehouse are destroyed by fire or other casualty, the Government does not get the tax on the spirits destroyed. The central, fire-proof, special bonded warehouse cuts off all these useless and demoralizing expenses for storekeepers and gaugers, and reduces the risk of destruction by fire over insurance or otherwise to the minimum. Where or how can the fraud or abstraction in transitu be perpetrated in making this change, any more than in transporting goods for export, or in the changes now allowed under section 3272 of the Revised Statutes?

The Department in Washington has, as I have several times repeated, the history of each package in each distillery warehouse, and the receipt of the officer in charge of the special warehouse must show that he receives all that left the distillery warehouse, just as the officer at the port from which exports are made must show that he has received what left the western warehouses for export.

After reading the great outcry as to the frauds and outrages not only possible, but inevitable, if not designed, as it is charged, by the provisions of this bill, I had a carefully prepared table made of the whisky production in that portion of the eighth Kentucky district represented in Congress by Hon. JOHN D. WHITE, which illustrates fully the necessity for the provisions of the House bill. I hope Senators will examine it carefully. The table is as follows:

Amount now in warehouse					3,473

Grand total, $8,284.60.

Average while running, 4.78 bushels a day, producing 11.95 gallons, for seventy days per annum. There are now seven storekeeper gaugers employed, at $3 per day making $21, and three general storekeepers, at $4, making $12; their daily pay being $33 to guard 3,473 gallons, or $3,125.70 of tax. The pay of officials for ninety-five days will amount to more than the tax. The amount of tax for the year ending June 30, 1881, is $8,284.60, and the pay of officers per year at present employed is $10,296. When General Clark was asked for the other expenditures in the eighth and ninth districts in Kentucky he called on Mr. F. D. Sewell, chief of the division of revenue agents, for information, and received the following reply:

APRIL 19, 1882.

GENERAL: I find that there has been expended from the appropriation for the discovery of violations of internal-revenue law since June 30, 1878, to the present time, $5,687.78 in the eighth district of Kentucky, and $1,434.27 in the ninth district; total, $7,122.05. This has been used entirely for the discovery and seizure of illicit stills and the arrest of offenders. In addition to this quite a large amount has been expended by revenue agents for special employés who have been employed in that State and have devoted a good deal of their time to work in Landram's district.

I am not able, however, to determine the amount expended in this way. It would be safe to put it at not less than $1,000; probably $1,500 is nearer the correct amount.

Respectfully,

F. D. SEWELL,
Chief Division of Revenue Agents.

General W. T. CLARK, Chief Clerk.

I hardly suppose that Senators will pay much attention to the recommendations of a secretary who insists that an attempt to correct a system which now produces such results as these is dishonest, and seeks to encourage frauds. As politicians the Secretary and his allies may think it very hard on the party to remove the patriot from James Millen's distillery warehouse in Knox County, whose arduous duty it is to guard a ten-gallon keg in a bonded warehouse at $3 per day, but they will hardly persuade Senators that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is in a whisky ring when he recommends the collection of all these scraps into a fire-proof special wherehouse at some railroad point in the district, and have them guarded by one man instead of twelve. That exhibit is only a specimen of the condition of things in fifty other districts that I could name in a number of States, and there can be no rational solution of the opposition to the wise recommendations of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, or to the House bill, except that it dispenses with a worthless horde of miserable political bummers.

That is all I care to say about the bill proper at this time. I would, if the Senate had the constitutional right, vote to amend the bill so as to reduce the tax on distilled spirits from 90 cents to 50 cents a gallon, for the reasons given by me on this floor on the 10th day of January last, when, discussing another question, I then said:

I believe reasonably low taxes produce high revenues. Sixteen cents on tobacco now produces more than 24 did. Whisky at 50 cents would in five years produce more than 90 does. No man should be required to pay excise taxes on more than goes into consumption, and not until it does, whether it be one, three, five, or ten years. The interest of the producer will induce sales as rapidly as the demand for consumption requires, and after spirits leave the Government warehouse they should be absolutely free, all espionage should cease. The taxes on licenses and all other restrictions should be removed; that done, half the oppressions of the system would disappear. Fifty cents tax, payable when the goods are removed from the care of the United States officers, and all other charges and taxes abolished, is the true revenue basis in view of our present indebtedness and the necessity to collect large revenues. Anything beyond that means no relief to the distillers of the country, and they do not now ask for more. It is a useless waste of our resources to be maintaining taxation to collect, as we now do, over $100,000,000 more than we need.

Supplementing that view, and, as I think, strongly enforcing it, I will publish as part of my remarks a table originally prepared with great care and no small amount of labor by Hon. P. B. THOMPSON, a Representative from Kentucky, and revised by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, which was printed by order of the Senate on my motion made by direction of the Finance Committee. The table is as follows:

Statement of the quantities of spirits distilled from materials other than fruit, produced, withdrawn for consumption, remaining in warehouse at close of the year, and exported; also the several rates of tax per gallon at which collections were made, the amount of tax collected on spirits withdrawn for consumption, and all other taxes relating to distilled spirits, by fiscal years, from September 1, 1862, to June 30, 1881.

* Ten months

That table shows that in 1870 and 1872, when the tax was 50 cents, the quantities withdrawn from bond for consumption were greater than in 1880 and 1881 under the 90 cents tax, although our population has increased from 38,000,000 to over 50,000,000 and all other products have increased much more proportionately than population has.

I have no doubt that if the tax was restored to 50 cents the increase in consumption would be at least 40 per cent. I do not mean drank, but used in the thousand ways that alcohol enters into other products. The increased consumption of 40 per cent. at the reduced rate would at once maintain the revenue to its present point, while it would largely reduce the cost of all manufactures in which alcohol is used, and furnish an increased market to the farmer for his corn and rye at a time when by our railroad extensions a home market is very much needed for our immense agricultural surplus.

I have no doubt that the same effect would follow as followed the reduction of the tobacco tax from 24 to 16 cents, there being a very large increase of revenue already from the reduction growing out of increased consumption.

I do not desire to weary Senators by amplification, nor to encumber the RECORD with tabular statements, but as I have said that the spirits now in bond, though stored in Kentucky warehouses, were owned largely elsewhere, I ask attention to the following table which is a fair exhibit of the localities in which all spirits in bond are held and owned:

This table is useful, at least for the purpose of answering any suggestion that the bill is specially in the interest of citizens of Kentucky, because the bonded spirits happen to be produced there, and it also shows that consumers ought to pay the tax.

A few words as to the "excise laws of England" and I am content to submit this bill to the consideration of Senators. We have in many ways recognized the wisdom and prudence of the legislation of that country, and most of the valuable provisions of our excise laws are taken from theirs. I hold in my hand Bateman's Excise Manual, which gives a complete history of the English system of internal-revenue taxation, a few extracts from which will show that all the provisions of the House bill now under consideration are in strict conformity to the system which has for a long time worked so well there. On page 751 will be found all the provisions we have adopted as to distillery warehouses, and on page 753 will be found the provision for the special bonded warehouse system provided for in the House bill, in these words:

Distillers may, under such regulations as the commissioners may make, also deposit spirits without payment of duty in any general warehouses provided by the commissioners.

And on page 777, after making equitable provision for the loss by evaporation which is incident to that character of goods, the following provisions are made:

SEC. 7. On the delivery of any cask or package of spirits from an excise warehouse duties shall be charged and paid upon the quantity of spirits actually found in such cask or package at the time of the delivery thereof, by weight, measure, or gauge, as the commissioners may direct. * * *

SEC. 8. If any officer shall at any time find a greater deficiency (whether calculated by weight, measure, or gauge) in the quantity of spirits which should be contained in any cask or package deposited in warehouse without payment of duty than can be accounted for by natural waste or other legitimate cause, the commissioners may require immediate payment of the duty on the quantity of spirits originally warehoused in such cask or package.

In short, the English tax is on consumption and on nothing else, without limitation as to the time the producer has the right to keep it in bond, while the penalties for fraud are similar to, though milder than those prescribed by the bill of the House now before us. In that country they collect without trouble or loss $2 a gallon tax. They allow all grades of spirits to remain in bond as long as the producer thinks it is his interest that they should so remain. In short, the House bill adopts the uniform system which our Constitution prescribes in regard to excise taxes, and the system which the experience of England has shown conclusively works so well there in the interests of the Government and the producer.

These facts seem to me to be a sufficient vindication of the justice, honesty, and wisdom of the House bill and of the recommendations of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and a sufficient response to all the criticisms of the Secretary of the Treasury, who, as I said, while doubtless a good lawyer, is profoundly ignorant of the internal-revenue system of either this or other countries.

One word about whisky rings, concerning which I did not at first propose to speak, and I am done. The following telegram discloses what the whisky ring is, and will enable the committee to get at the bottom facts:

CHICAGO 10, 1882.

To G. C. WHARTON, Willard's Hotel, Washington:

Funds collected by the Western Export Association were all expended for legitimate purposes, and had nothing whatever to do with legislation. That money was all paid to exporters of surplus alcohol to cover their losses. German alcohol being very low, this was done to save our home market from extreme depression, and if necessary shall be pleased to produce full particulars to a committee or any one.

H. H. SHUFELDT.

Mr. Shufeldt, of Chicago, is the president of the United States Distillers' and Liquor Dealers' Association, and Colonel G. C. Wharton, of Louisville, is their attorney here. His brief in regard to this measure was laid before the Finance Committee. He was for a long time, indeed during most of the time while General Grant was President, United States District Attorney for Kentucky. He is a gentleman of high character and of fine legal attainments. He was doubtless selected as attorney by the distillers because of his intimate knowledge of all the details of the internal-revenue system. His care for the interests of the Government while an officer has of course made all the illicit distillers and their advocates his enemies; but that only adds to his good name wherever he is known.

By Colonel Wharton's permission I read the following letter from Mr. Shufeldt elaborating the statements made in the telegram. Along with the letter was a printed circular, signed by Mr. H. B. Miller, president of the Western Export Association, which sets forth still more in detail the exigencies which required the formation of the ring, if that name is preferred, and the payment of very large sums of money, all of them honest, earnest efforts of business men to avert as best they could the impending ruin which political agitation and overproduction had brought upon them. I will not read the circular, as it was very fully and fairly set forth and explained in the New York Herald of Saturday last, and thus obtained a much wider circulation than the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD could give it, but will hand it to the Senate Committee and commend to them a thorough investigation of how to legislate so as to give reasonable stability and security against Congressional interference with the legitimate business of honest men. The letter is as follows:

CHICAGO, May 10, 1882.

DEAR SIR: Your dispatch answered in full by wire. We raised month by month, until all amounted to some $600,000. Even with this we found ourselves short and had to call an extra assessment on March 28, as the inclosed resolution provides, of $3 per bushel on each house in the pool. We run 1,800 bushels, therefore our assessment was $5,400, which shows on the extra assessment sheet herewith. When the trade opened last fall every one thought it good and filled their barns with cattle. The tax agitation came on and they could not sell their products which they were forced to make on account of the cattle. This day by day affected the market until we clubbed together and told those men who had been exporters we would pay them any loss they made, provided they would ship abroad and slaughter their goods there in preference to putting them on a home market. Monthly assessments were made and their losses were paid, and this is what became of the money. I know of my own knowledge there has never been a single dollar of the money of either association ever expended in legislation except legitimate expenses.

Yours, truly,

H. H. SHUFELDT.

G. C. WHARTON, Esq.

Nothing that I could say would add anything to the force or clearness of the presentation Mr. Shufeldt makes of the sacrifices he and his associates have had to submit to in order to save themselves from the baneful effects of overproduction and political agitation. Seven hundred and sixty thousand dollars has been sacrificed to prevent still worse results, yet men who without fault have suffered so grievously are held as "suspects," while politicians caused most of their losses.

The struggles against bankruptcy and ruin in the near future which the producers of high wines and spirits for export have been compelled to make is now being made by the representatives of the people in the bill sent to us from the House with such signal, I might say unparalleled, unanimity. On behalf of all the men, everywhere, who are the holders and owners of whisky in bond, Colonel C. W. Moulton, of Ohio, as attorney for the distillers and dealers in Cincinnati, has filed with the Finance Committee a very able brief setting forth with great clearness and force the urgent reasons why the bill of the House ought to pass. Appended to it is the following instructive table:

Of the above, the following spirits are required to be tax-paid, as follows:

From May 1, 1882, to December 31, 1882	1,761,647 gallons,	$1,585,482 30
From January 1, 1883, to December 31, 1883	16,603,870 gallons,	14,943,483 00
From January 1, 1884, to December 31, 1884	43,127,666 gallons,	38,814,899 40
From January 1, 1885, to March 31, 1885	15,594,648 gallons,	14,035,183 20
	77,087,831	69,379,047 90

NOTE.—Over four-fifths of the above are held in bond by dealers resident of the States of Illinois, Kentucky, Massachusetts, Missouri, New York, and Ohio.

(The statistics show that less than one-seventh of the above is held by residents of Kentucky.)

From this table it will be seen that for the six months from January till July of next year the tax on spirits in bond will amount to $8,745,956, and in two years and ten months to about $70,000,000.

Mr. President, is it wonderful? Is it any evidence of fraud or unfairness that this great business interest should seek relief at our hands and urge it earnestly and promptly? Every bank and banking association in the cities of Louisville and Lexington, Kentucky, State, national, and private, have united in an earnest petition to the Senate to pass the House bill. Large numbers of bankers (I cannot say all as I can for Lexington and Louisville) from Cincinnati, Chicago, Saint Louis, and the other great cities of the West have done the same thing, while the petitions I have received from all over Kentucky from distillers and dealers prove how nervously anxious they are for relief, and for relief now.

Suggestions are made by some Senators to postpone the consideration of this measure till December. These propositions need not deceive anybody; they mean the defeat of the measure. Think of it; this Congress expires March 4, 1883. There are not seventy working days from the meeting in December till its final dissolution. All the appropriation bills for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1883, have to be considered and passed in that time. All the important measures relating to commerce, navigation, and transportation, to say nothing of the hundreds of private and public bills which will go over from this to the short session, will be crowding for consideration. The tariff commission is ordered to make its final report on all the great questions submitted to it on the opening of the session in December. In short, postponement of this measure till December means refusal to grant relief and simply keep up agitation by holding out delusive promises. Better defeat the bill at once, and let men prepare for the worst, than force the trade to languish with a hope of reduction of tax and extension of time during a short session when there will be neither time nor opportunity to consider either.

It is not the whisky trade alone that is involved; men who have cattle and hogs to feed or grain to sell are all concerned. The banks are carrying immense sums of money on the security of whisky in bond. Stringency in money in one trade raises rates of interest on all, and all interests and all industries suffer. No man dares to make a contract in advance, as the promise of reduction to 50 cents in December is still held out. There is no estimating the ramifications of the financial distress which will follow from the combined influences of the continued agitation and increasing glut from oversupply. The overproduction in 1873 in iron, and perhaps a few other things, involved and paralyzed every interest in the country, and the distrust continued and increased for five years. The annual circular issued by the mercantile agency of Dun, Barlow & Co., of New York, tells the tale in the following exhibit:

Years.	Number of failures.	Amount of liabilities.
1874	5,830	$155,239,000
1875	7,740	201,050,353
1876	9,092	191,117,780

These alarming figures show that both in number of failures and amount of liabilities 1878 was worse than 1874. Prosperity returned in 1879, and the number of failures was reduced nearly one-half, and the liabilities more than half of those of 1878. Congress can, without injury or risk to the revenue, prevent a recurrence of the evils which followed overproduction in 1873 by the prompt passage of the House bill, or some similar measure.

That is all I care to say on the subject now. If I have so far attracted the attention or aroused the interest of Senators as to induce them to study the bill sent here by the representatives of the people with such signal unanimity, on a unanimous report from the Committee on Ways and Means of that body, whose ability and intelligence as well as their integrity needs no indorsement, recommended as it is, too, by the Internal Revenue Department, whose special duty it is to protect alike the revenues of the Government and the business interests of the citizens who pay it, I shall have accomplished all I desired or expected.

I feel assured that the better this measure is understood the more surely it will receive the support of Senators, and it was only because I was convinced that Senators had not the time personally to give it the consideration it required that I have presumed to trespass now on the valuable time of the Senate to lay the matter before it in advance of the action of the Finance Committee. I shall make the House bill an appendix to these remarks.

An act to amend the laws relating to the entry of distilled spirits in distillery and special bonded warehouses, and the withdrawal of the same therefrom.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the tax on all distilled spirits hereafter entered for deposit in distillery warehouse, or in special bonded warehouse, or remaining in such warehouse at the time of the passage of this act, shall be payable before and at the time the same are withdrawn therefrom, except in cases of withdrawals therefrom without the payment of tax as now authorized by law.

Every person intending to commence or continue the business of a distiller, or having at the time of the passage of this act spirits deposited in his distillery warehouse or in any special bonded warehouse, shall, within thirty days from the date of and after the passage of this act, or at the time of commencing business or of commencing to deposit in a special bonded warehouse, and on the first day of May following, and on the first day of May of each year thereafter, file with the collector of internal revenue for the district in which his distillery or any special bonded warehouse in which he has spirits deposited is located a statement, in duplicate, under oath, of the quantity of distilled spirits stored in the distillery warehouse, or of the quantity of spirits of his own production stored in a special bonded warehouse, specifying in either case the number and the serial numbers of the packages, and the number of proof-gallons contained therein, as shown by the original gauge; and also a declaration, in duplicate, of the largest number of packages and of proof-gallons of distilled spirits he intends to have stored at the close of any one day in said distillery warehouse or special bonded warehouse during the year or fraction of a year ending on the 30th day of April next ensuing; and shall, at the time of filing said statement and declaration, give bond, in duplicate, in a form prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with two or more sureties satisfactory to the collector of his district, conditioned that the principal named in said bond shall pay all taxes shown to be due by the original gauge, less only the lawful allowance for loss, upon all spirits withdrawn or removed from his distillery warehouse, or upon all spirits of his own production withdrawn or removed from a special bonded warehouse, during the year or fraction of a year ending on the 30th day of April next ensuing, or after that date and before a new warehousing bond shall be given; and that he shall comply in all respects with all the provisions of law concerning the warehousing and withdrawal or rebonding of said spirits.

The penal sum of said bond shall be as follows, namely:

When the largest quantity of spirits to be stored in the warehouse, as set forth in the distiller's statement and declaration, does not exceed 50 barrels or 40 proof-gallons each, $1,800;

When exceeding 50 such barrels and not exceeding 100 such barrels, $3,000;

When exceeding 100 such barrels and not exceeding 500 such barrels, $4,000;

When exceeding 500 such barrels and not exceeding 1,000 such barrels, $20,000;

When exceeding 1,000 such barrels and not exceeding 2,500 such barrels, $40,000;

When exceeding 2,500 such barrels and not exceeding 5,000 such barrels, $60,000;

When exceeding 5,000 such barrels and not exceeding 10,000 such barrels, $80,000;

When exceeding 10,000 such barrels and not exceeding 20,000 such barrels, $120,000;

When exceeding 20,000 such barrels and not exceeding 30,000 such barrels, $160,000; and

When exceeding 30,000 such barrels, $200,000; but in no case shall the penal sum of any warehousing bond be greater than $200,000.

An additional bond shall be required in case the quantity of spirits at any time actually in the warehouse exceeds the quantity set forth in the statement or declaration, or in case of the death, insolvency, or removal of either of the sureties, and may be required in any other contingency, at the discretion of the collector or Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

No collector shall approve the bond of the distiller required by section 3260 of the Revised Statutes of the United States until the distiller shall have filed a statement and declaration, and shall have given a warehousing bond satisfactory to the collector, in conformity with the provisions of this act. Every collector who violates this provision shall forfeit and pay $2,000, and be dismissed from office.

Bonds given under this section shall be and remain in force, as to spirits remaining in warehouse on the 1st day of May following, until the execution and approval of the new bond, and shall remain in full force for the collection of the tax upon all spirits covered thereby which shall have been unlawfully removed or withdrawn during the period for which the bond was given. And nothing in this act contained shall impair or affect the warehousing bonds or transportation and warehousing bonds heretofore given, except as to the spirits described therein covered by bonds given under this act. But the monthly warehousing bonds prescribed by section 3293 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended, shall not hereafter be required.

If the new bond is not given as required by this act, the collector shall proceed by distraint to collect the tax on all the spirits of the distiller remaining in the warehouse, issuing his warrant of distraint for the amount of tax found to be due as shown by the reports of the gauger when the spirits were entered into the warehouse, but this provision shall not exclude any other appropriate remedy or proceeding to enforce payment of the tax: Provided, That any distiller having spirits in warehouse at the time of the passage of this act for which warehouse bonds have been given, may, as to such spirits, at his option, omit to file the statement and give the bond required by this act, but in such case the warehousing bonds already given for such spirits shall remain in full force, and the principal and sureties on said bond shall be held to full compliance with the conditions of the same: Provided, That in case the person required to make the statement and give the bond aforesaid shall die, shall become of unsound mind, or shall, in the opinion of the collector or Commissioner of Internal Revenue, become otherwise legally incapable of making such statement or giving such bond, the statement may be made and the bond may be given by his executor, administrator, guardian, trustee, or other personal or legal representative.

That section 3262 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended, be further amended by adding thereto the following:

"And provided further, That whenever, by reason of any restriction on the title or of any pending legal proceedings respecting the transmission or change of title or the legal control or management of any real estate on which, or any part thereof, a distillery erected prior to July 20, 1868, is situated, in whole or in part, or whenever, by reason of the death, insanity, inability, or removal of any executor or executors, administrator or administrators, trustee or trustees, or the disagreement of any coexecutors, administrators, or trustees, having charge of such real estate, the consent hereinbefore provided for cannot be had at the time and in the manner required, then, in lieu of said consent, the collector may at the discretion of the Commissioner, be authorized to accept the bond hereinbefore prescribed for the appraised value of that portion of the distillery property or of that interest therein as to which the consent cannot be obtained; but such bond shall not be regarded as being in lieu of the consent required in respect to that portion of the distillery premises as to which no disability to give consent exists."

SEC. 2. That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall be, and hereby is, authorized, in his discretion, and upon the execution of such bonds as he may prescribe, to establish one or more warehouses to be known as special bonded warehouses in any one collection district, each of which warehouses shall be in charge of a storekeeper, to be appointed, assigned, transferred, and paid in the same manner as storekeepers for distillery warehouses are now appointed, assigned, transferred, and paid. Every such warehouse shall be under the control of the collector of internal revenue of the district in which such warehouse is located, and shall be in the joint custody of the storekeeper and proprietor thereof, and kept securely locked, and shall at no time be unlocked or opened, or remain open, except in the presence of such storekeeper or other person who may be designated to act for him, as provided in the case of distillery warehouses. And such warehouses shall be under such further regulation as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may prescribe.

SEC. 3. That whenever the quantity of distilled spirits in the warehouse of any grain or molasses distillery at or after the time of its permanent discontinuance as a distillery, or after distilling shall have been suspended at the distillery during a period of twelve months, shall not exceed 4,000 proof-gallons, the distiller shall immediately pay the tax upon such spirits, or he may, or any distiller, or his legal representatives, having at any time spirits in his distillery warehouse which he wishes to transfer to a special bonded warehouse may, under regulations to be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, cause such spirits to be removed in bond from the distillery warehouse to and deposited in a special bonded warehouse, in the same collection district, after making such entries and executing and filing with the collector of the district such bonds and bills of lading, and giving such other additional security as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury.

In case of such permanent discontinuance or of such suspension, if the tax is not paid or the spirits are not so removed, it shall be the duty of the collector to collect the tax by distraint, issuing his warrant of distraint for the amount of the tax found to be due as ascertained by him from the report of the gauge as made by the gauger at the time of the entry of the spirits into warehouse; but this provision shall not exclude any other appropriate remedy or proceeding to enforce the payment of the tax.

SEC. 4. That all distilled spirits intended for deposit in a special bonded warehouse, before being removed from the distillery warehouse, shall have affixed to each package an engraved stamp indicative of such intention, to be provided and furnished to the several collectors as in the case of other stamps, and to be charged to them and accounted for in the same manner.

SEC. 5. That the provisions of existing law in regard to the payments of tax on withdrawal of distilled spirits from warehouse, and as to the gauging, marking, branding, and stamping of the same upon such withdrawal, and in regard to the exportation of distilled spirits, or their transfer to manufacturing warehouses, and in regard to withdrawals for the use of the United States, or scientific institutions, or colleges of learning, including the provisions for allowance for leakage or loss by unavoidable accident, are hereby extended and made applicable to spirits deposited in special bonded warehouses under this act. And whenever spirits are withdrawn from a special bonded warehouse for exportation, or for transfer to a manufacturing warehouse, an engraved stamp indicative of intention to export shall first be affixed to each package so removed, as in the case of spirits withdrawn from a distillery bonded warehouse for exportation under the provisions of section 3330 of the Revised Statutes, as amended, all the provisions of which section not inconsistent with this act are hereby made applicable to such withdrawals. And the provisions of existing law relative to an allowance of loss by casualty in a distillery bonded warehouse are hereby made applicable to distilled spirits stored in special bonded warehouses in accordance with the provisions of this act.

SEC. 6. That the tax upon any distilled spirits removed from a distillery warehouse for deposit in a special bonded warehouse, and in respect of which any requirement of this act is not complied with, shall, at any time when knowledge of such fact is obtained by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, be assessed by him upon the distiller of the same, and returned to the collector, who shall immediately demand payment of such tax, and upon the neglect or refusal of payment by the distiller shall proceed to collect the same by distraint. But this provision shall not exclude any other remedy or proceeding provided by law to enforce the payment of the tax. If it shall appear at any time that there has been a loss of distilled spirits from any cask or package deposited in a distillery warehouse or special bonded warehouse, other than the loss provided for in section 3221 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which in the opinion of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is excessive, he may instruct the collector of the district in which the loss has occurred to require the withdrawal from warehouse of such spirits, and to collect the tax accrued upon the original quantity of distilled spirits entered into the warehouse in such cask or package, less only the allowance for loss provided by law. If the said tax is not paid on demand, the collector shall report the amount due as shown by the original gauge upon his next monthly list, and it shall be assessed and collected as other taxes are assessed and collected.

SEC. 7. That in case any distilled spirits removed from a distillery warehouse for deposit in a special bonded warehouse shall fail to be deposited in such special bonded warehouse within ten days after such removal, or within the time specified in any bond given on such removal, or if any distilled spirits deposited in any special bonded warehouse shall be taken therefrom for export or otherwise without full compliance with the provisions of this act, and with the requirements of any regulations made thereunder, and with the terms of any bond given on such removal, or if any distilled spirits which have been deposited in a special bonded warehouse, shall be found elsewhere, not having been removed therefrom according to law, any person who shall be guilty of such failure, or any person who shall in any manner violate any provisions of this act, shall be subject, on conviction, to a fine of not less than $100 nor more than $5,000, and to imprisonment for not less than three months nor more than three years, for every such failure or violation; and the spirits as to which such failure or violation or unlawful removal shall take place shall be forfeited to the United States.

SEC. 8. That nothing herein contained shall be held to repeal or affect the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1877, entitled "An act relating to the production of fruit brandy and to punish frauds connected with the same," excepting the provisions as to the period of three years therein fixed for the payment of the tax, the exclusive use of the special bonded warehouses therein provided for the storage of brandy made from grapes, and as to the character of the warehousing bonds therein provided.

SEC. 9. That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may make all needful rules and regulations for carrying into effect the provisions of this act.

SEC. 10. That whenever the owner of distilled spirits shall desire to withdraw the same from the distillery warehouse, or from a special bonded warehouse, he may file with the collector a notice giving a description of the packages to be withdrawn, and request that the distilled spirits be regauged, and thereupon the collector shall direct the gauger to regauge the same, and mark upon each package so regauged the number of gauge or wine gallons and proof-gallons therein contained. If upon such regauging it shall appear that there has been a loss of distilled spirits from any cask or package, without the fault or negligence of the distiller or owner thereof, taxes shall be collected only on the quantity of distilled spirits contained in such cask or package at the time of the withdrawal thereof from the distillery warehouse or special bonded warehouse: Provided, That the allowance which shall be made for such loss of spirits as aforesaid shall not exceed 1 proof-gallon for 2 months or part thereof; 1½ gallons for 3 and 4 months; 2 gallons for 5 and 6 months; 2½ gallons for 7 and 8 months; 3 gallons for 9 and 10 months; 3½ gallons for 11 and 12 months; 4 gallons for 13, 14, and 15 months; 4½ gallons for 16, 17, and 18 months; 5 gallons for 19, 20, and 21 months; 5½ gallons for 22, 23, and 24 months; 6 gallons for 25, 26, and 27 months; 6½ gallons for 28, 29, and 30 months; 7 gallons for 31, 32, and 33 months; 7½ gallons for 34, 35, and 36 months; 8 gallons for 37, 38, 39, and 40 months; 8½ gallons for 41, 42, 43, and 44 months; 9 gallons for 45, 46, 47, and 48 months; 9½ gallons for 49, 50, 51, and 52 months; 10 gallons for 53, 54, 55, and 56 months; 10½ gallons for 57, 58, 59, and 60 months; 11 gallons for 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, and 66 months; 11½ gallons for 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, and 72 months; 12 gallons for 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, and 78 months; 12½ gallons for 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, and 84 months; 13 gallons for 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, and 90 months; and 13½ gallons for 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, and 96 months; and no further allowance shall be made: Provided also, That the foregoing allowance or loss shall apply only to casks or packages of a capacity of 40 or more wine-gallons, and that the allowance for loss on casks or packages of less capacity than 40 gallons shall not exceed one-half the amount allowed on said forty-gallon cask or package; but no allowance shall be made on casks or packages of less capacity than 20 gallons: And provided further, That the proof of such distilled spirits shall not in any case be computed at the time of withdrawal at less than 100 per cent.

SEC. 11. That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, after the long, elaborate exposition and defense of the House bill for the extension of warehouse privileges to distilled spirits for the long term of eight years, as I cannot quite agree with my friend, the Senator from Kentucky, in his view of the measure, I think it but fair that the other side should for a few minutes be heard. As the Secretary of the Treasury, a painstaking gentleman of great ability and of the highest character, has made a report against the bill as it came to us from the House, I desire to show that he was fully justified at least in reaching the adverse conclusions presented by him to the Committee on Finance.

The Senator from Kentucky refers to the favorable action and opinion of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, but I followed the opinion of the Commissioner as to the diminution of revenue when the tobacco bill for a reduction of duties was under consideration and found myself greatly misled. I have very great confidence in the Commissioner, but I expect a year or two hence, if this bill should pass, it will show the Commissioner to have been again greatly mistaken. Such results only show the extreme difficulty of making predictions about the results of amendments to the internal-revenue laws.

The Senator fails to bring out the essential details of the bill and appears to rely mainly for his support of the bill upon its indorsement by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. When this bill suddenly made its appearance, without the advantage of any public discussion of the measure in the House, I really supposed there might be some impending calamity requiring instant action; and we were told that any delay beyond the 1st of May might be attended by frightful disasters. The House ran away from the storm more promptly, perhaps, than they would from a storm predicted by Vennor; but after all the 1st of May came and has gone, and there is not a cloud visible in the horizon as big as a man's hand. The thunder was all stage thunder.

I do not mean to suggest that there is not a large and a very large amount of Bourbon whisky in bond upon which the tax will be due within three years from the time it was warehoused, but I do mean to assert that there is not so much now warehoused upon which three years will have run and upon which the tax must be paid in the whole of the coming year as will be required for consumption during the present year. In fact, it would be safe to say there is not half as much as is required for a year's consumption. There is, therefore, no need of any hurry about this bill. If such a bill shall ever be required, it certainly cannot be now, nor for a year to come. We are not called upon to shut our eyes and swallow the bill without a why or a wherefore. I will give the table furnished by the Department showing the exact number of gallons in bond, and the date, month by month, when the tax will become due. By this table it will be seen that the tax on less than a million of gallons will fall due in the next four months, or in all of May, June, July, and August, and for the whole year there are only 8,435,243 gallons upon which the tax must be paid as the law now stands:

Statement by months of all spirits in bond on which the tax matures before and up to May 1, 1883.

Months when produced.	Taxable gallons.	When tax falls due.
1879—April	250,585	1882—May.
May	338,361	June.
June	242,634	July.
July	102,244	August.
August	68,011	September.
September	115,205	October.
October	232,967	November.
November	411,640	December.
December	612,307	1883—January.
1880—January	936,941	February.
February	1,276,587	March.
March	1,768,393	April.
April	2,079,368	May.
Total	8,435,243

For a time the demand for early action upon this bill was very loud and hot. Since the facts have been brought out about the inconsiderable amount of stock on hand that could possibly be affected the present year the urgency has largely subsided. The Finance Committee is now neither besieged by the agents of interested parties nor overwhelmed by correspondence. Many of those engaged in the business, if their written and oral communications are to be accepted, not only do not hanker after this measure but they doubt its prudence and propriety. Like whisky itself, it is a measure which it may be better to keep a while in abeyance. It is not yet ripe.

There are other parties to be heard. The Government has a large interest at stake and must legislate with that prudence and foresight that will best promote uniformity and stability in its receipts and not stimulate overproduction one year to be followed by a collapse the next. The Government is the largest partner in the business, and under even the existing law takes the largest risks. The distiller of the high wines, from which comes the poor man's whisky, has to pay 90 cents tax per gallon at once, with no leakage for a long series of years deducted, while the whisky of those who are better able and willing to pay for it, nursed and ripened night and day by the care of a United States storekeeper until it has much more than doubled in price, pays no additional duty, nothing in the way even of interest; but the leakage, though it may amount to a quarter part of the whole, is all to be deducted according to the provisions of the House bill.

The distillers of high wines, altogether the most numerous body, can derive no benefit from this bill. The speculators, holding the class of spirits which ripen with age, are to reap all the profit of a further time of storage. Is this justice? Is there not gross wrong in taxing whisky the real value of which is not over 15 to 25 cents a gallon just the same as whisky worth ten times as much, and especially when the chief additional value has been made by the special favor and at the cost of the Government? Obviously so great is the advantage given to one class of old whisky that most of the large distillers of any other sort, or of the common kind, will be compelled in self-defense to change their business, in order that their whisky may be rectified by time and not by any artificial process. No single State, no two or three States, after the passage of such a bill as this, will long have a monopoly of Bourbon whisky. It forebodes and promotes, as I think, a revolution in the whole business.

Under existing laws, all spirits destroyed by fire or otherwise, without fraud or negligence, are exempted from tax. The spirits may be consumed and the owner suffer no loss, if he has been insured, but the Government must lose the whole tax that would otherwise have accrued. The bonding for a long period exposes the Government to greatly increased danger, as it is not insured, and is also much more exposed to fraud by the much greater accumulation of stocks.

The Treasury of the United States has so large an interest in deriving a legitimate and regular revenue from distilled spirits that I feel it to be the duty of Congress to see to it that there is nothing needlessly oppressive in our laws relating to distillers, and to ask nothing but an honest payment of taxes due. At the start our people had been long unused to an excise tax, and did not respond to it with promptitude nor in all places with fidelity. But, re-enforced by public opinion and the interest of honest distillers, the Government has recently been able very fairly to collect its dues. It will be seen by a reference to the many acts of Congress on this subject how we have gradually favored the demands of this business. It may not be without interest to refer to the main provisions of these acts, and see how far away stands the House bill now offered from what heretofore has been regarded as indispensable.

Under the act of July 1, 1862, section 39, a bond for warehousing, approved by collector, was required, but no shrinkage was allowed. Tax to be paid on removal. No material change was made in the act of June 30, 1864, nor in that of March 3, 1865. Act of July 13, 1866, required bonds with two sureties of not less than the amount of taxes on the spirits covered, approved by the Secretary of the Treasury and subject to change or renewal from time to time. Act of March 2, 1867, made no material change. Act of January 11, 1868, prohibited the withdrawal of spirits for any purpose until the full tax was paid. An exception was made for the export of rum June 25, 1868.

The act of July 20, 1868, provided that bonds should be given for the payment of the tax within one year from the date of the bond, and the bond to be not less than double the amount of the tax. Section 7 of this act required a bond of not less than double the amount of tax accruing on the quantity that could be distilled in the distillery during a period of fifteen days.

The act of January 11, 1868, prohibited the transfer of spirits from a distillery warehouse to any general warehouse, and also required tax-paid spirits to be withdrawn within nine months after the passage of the act.

The act of June 6, 1876, permitted spirits to be withdrawn for export without payment of tax thereon.

The act of February 21, 1876, permitted alcohol, free of tax, to be withdrawn for preserving specimens of anatomy by scientific institutions, and the act of March 1, 1879, authorized a like withdrawal of alcohol for the manufacture of medicines and perfumery for export.

Act of March 28, 1878, extended time of payment of taxes to three years from time of deposit in warehouse, but interest at the rate of 5 per cent. was required after the first year. The tax on spirits destroyed by fire, or otherwise without fraud or negligence, was also remitted.

Act of May 28, 1880, amended the act of 1868, requiring bonds to be in double the amount of the tax, so as to require not less than the amount of the tax on the spirits, and three years' warehousing, was continued, but the 5 per cent. interest was dropped.

Up to 1868 the practice was to allow a reasonable percentage for leakage, but there was no law for it.

When spirits were exported they were regauged and tax collected upon all deficiencies; but the act of May 28, 1880, allows leakage according to the schedule there provided. The act of December 20, 1879, allowed for leakage or unavoidable loss from transportation from distillery warehouse for exportation.

From this brief synopsis of these laws for the past twenty years it appears that the tax secured by bonds was to be paid on removal, and no shrinkage allowed, from 1862 to 1866. Then two sureties were required, and the bonds were subject to change and renewal. No material change then occurred until 1868, and then no spirits were to be withdrawn until the full tax was paid, except rum for export. In July, 1868, it was provided that the bonds should be given for the payment of the tax within one year, and of not less than double the amount accruing on the quantity which could be distilled in the distillery during a period of fifteen days. The act of January, 1868, prohibited the transfer of spirits from a distillery warehouse to any general warehouse, and required tax-paid spirits to be withdrawn within nine months after the passage of the act.

In 1876 the export of spirits was permitted without any payment of tax, and alcohol for the use of scientific institutions was allowed free. This privilege was extended in 1879 to alcohol used in medicine and perfumery for export.

In 1878 the time for the payment of the tax was extended to three years, with interest at the rate of five per cent. after the first year, and the tax on spirits destroyed by fire or otherwise, without fraud or negligence, was also remitted. In 1880 bonds were no longer to be double, but not less than the amount of the tax, and all interest was dropped.

The many frauds that occurred in 1866, 1867, and 1868 required rather rigorous measures for their repression, but since then the demands of the distillers have generally been very liberally conceded.

If there is any embarrassment now in the business of distillers it mainly arises from the laws of 1878 and 1880, which permit spirits to be held three years before the payment of any tax, and allows from that for any shrinkage. These laws were passed at the urgent request of distillers, and now the only mode of relief asked for by them from an immense overproduction in prospect is a further and prolonged eight years' extension of time for warehousing without payment of the tax, but with an allowance for shrinkage of nearly double the amount which the experience of the Internal Revenue Office shows has heretofore occurred. I am persuaded that the evil of which the holders of distilled spirits now complain would be aggravated by the pending measure, and that if it should unfortunately pass every succeeding year would find them more deeply involved. The sore, now perhaps confined to one district, would be scattered all over the country and prove remediless.

The claim upon the part of the supporters of this bill is that it is founded upon the principle of taxing only on consumption, and that that should be a rule of universal application. But it will at once be seen that such a rule is not observed in our foreign importations of any sort. Spirits from abroad may be warehoused and withdrawn within one year upon the payment of all duties and charges, but if they remain any longer they are subject to 10 per cent. additional duty, and no shrinkage is allowed from the quantity originally entered. At the end of three years all merchandise warehoused, if not taken out and all duties paid, is treated as abandoned and is sold at public auction. I will read the sections of the Revised Statutes as the law has been maintained for uncounted years:

SEC. 2970. Any merchandise deposited in bond in any public or private bonded warehouse may be withdrawn for consumption within one year from the date of original importation on payment of the duties and charges to which it may be subject by law at the time of such withdrawal; and after the expiration of one year from the date of original importation, and until the expiration of three years from such date, any merchandise in bond may be withdrawn for consumption on payment of the duties assessed on the original entry and charges, and an additional duty of 10 per cent. of the amount of such duties and charges.

SEC. 2971. * * * Any goods remaining in public store or bonded warehouse beyond three years shall be regarded as abandoned to the Government, and sold under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, and the proceeds paid into the Treasury. * * *

Now, if these provisions of law are proper—and they have never been disputed—in relation to the importers of spirituous liquors, why should they not be equally applicable to distillers, or to those who may be induced to buy American whisky in bond? Neither importers nor distillers would wish to pay duties until they can put their merchandise upon the market for consumption; but no inducement should be held out by the Government for overstocking the market, and only a reasonable time should be granted to dealers who have been temporarily caught on a falling market for their escape. Three years would, therefore, seem equal to all that should be demanded.

If it be suggested that this rule has not been applied to the internal-revenue tax upon tobacco and fermented liquors, it must be borne in mind that tobacco and fermented liquors do not improve by protracted age, and the interest of holders promptly forces such articles upon the market. The interests of the Government and of the holders coincide, and there is little or no opportunity for fraud from any delay. Tobacco and ale or beer by no means furnish a parallel case with that of whisky, when the article is constantly and largely increasing in value, and when the temptations to fraud and corruption are both great and ever present.

By the bill as it came to us from the House the chief burden and risk is thrown upon the Government, which must wait for its revenue for many years, not only without interest, but with a very large and excessive reduction of leakage from the amount at the date of the original entry to the warehouse. The Government must furnish gaugers and storekeepers, and take the risk that they will remain for the longest period incorruptible, and that they will always prove capable of detecting fraud. No one can pretend that this risk will not be vastly increased if the warehousing period shall be extended from three years to eight or even to five years. I do not mean to say that fraud is more to be expected from distillers than from any other class of men, but the whisky in bond will be largely owned not only by distillers but by speculators and those who buy for a rise in the market price. We multiply the chances of fraud by lengthening the term during which the Government is to remain as custodian, and also increase the temptation by immensely increasing the quantity to be looked after.

One large source of profit to the distiller is often found in the charge he makes of $1 per barrel upon the buyer for annual storage. Thus for the storage of 25,000 barrels a rental may be obtained of $25,000.

By the terms of the bill bonds were to be given, not for the payment of all taxes upon the spirits in the warehouse, but only upon such as should be withdrawn, and the bonds were to be given annually. The penal sum of one class of bonds is $160,000, with a right to store 30,000 barrels, upon which the tax would amount to over a million of dollars. This would seem to be taking too much on trust. Ten days' time is also given for the transportation of spirits from the distillery warehouse to a special warehouse, but there is no provision which would show how much is landed at the special warehouse, whether whisky or water, and these facts might not be found out for years to come. No more easy gateway to fraud could well be provided.

It is strange that the framers of this bill should not have included spirits made from fruit, the class of spirits that derives most advantage from age. Brandy made from grapes or peaches very largely and for many years increases in value through age; and the throat of a bronze statue would not withstand the flow of fresh juvenile apple brandy. It requires age to make it tolerable anywhere. The raw material for fruit brandy of any kind costs more than twice as much as the raw material for whisky. Why, then, should it not have fair play? Age is indispensable to make it marketable, and for a given quantity as much labor and more capital are required. Surely if spirits from grain should be exempt from tax until they increase fourfold in value, the same favor should be extended to brandy made of grapes, peaches, and apples.

The tax on brandy made from fruit must by existing law be paid within four months, and no deduction whatever is allowed for shrinkage. If the tax should hereafter be reduced or wholly removed, the holders of high wines or fruit-brandy will have paid more, or perhaps have paid taxes for three successive years after such tax has ceased upon the grain distillers, who make what is called Bourbon whisky, the price of which advances so rapidly with age. But the fruit distillers would not have asked for any favor except for the example of a portion of the grain distillers, whose profits have always been in excess of their own.

The sole purpose of the Government in levying a tax on spirituous drinks is revenue. At the same time I am ready to confess that I should be glad to see any evidences of increased thrift of our people by a diminished consumption. But while the consumption was less for some years after the panic of 1873, it has risen again in 1881 to high-water mark, and the consumption of spirits was 68,073,773 gallons as compared with 66,329,154 gallons in 1873, and of fermented liquors it was 410,368,700 gallons against 276,235,513 gallons, being an increase of nearly 50 per cent. This is a very large increase of the use of fermented liquors, now equal to over 8 gallons per capita, reckoning 50,155,783 as our population, but it is much less than the 27½ gallons per capita consumed by the people of Great Britain. These liquors are likely to furnish a basis of more or less revenue for some years to come, and it is important, whatever may be the amount, that it shall be so regular and stable as to permit a Secretary of the Treasury to make at least an approximate estimate of the amount of revenue which may annually be derived from this source.

But the privilege of exemption from tax for three years of spirits in a general warehouse and the large profits for the past two years has opened a new field of investments to all the wildest speculators in the land. We have only to look at the facts to see that the extension of the bonding period to three years has already more than doubled the production of 1881 compared with 1871, and the bill of the House proposes to add five years more to that unfortunate extension. Last year, with a sudden increase up to 32,640,000 gallons of spirits in warehouses, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue called attention to what he thought was an overproduction and a danger of loss. This year, with the immense stock on hand more than doubled, he would have us believe that it will soon cause a reduction of the product if we will only open the door twice or thrice as wide to pile it up still higher.

Under this system, broadcast and taking root all over the country, the amount of tax-paid spirits to be withdrawn annually for consumption becomes of all things a most uncertain quantity. The owners may withhold their stock from market, and assess their association to sustain their weaker brethren, as they have done to meet the losses on the exportation of alcohol; or they may, crippled in credit, be overtaken by a panic, and let millions of overproduction at once slide upon a market already dizzy and glutted.

It may be urged that the self-interest of distillers and of all the dealers will in the end regulate production; and so it will, but it will regulate it by a catastrophe if we provide by legislation a trap into which many innocent men are sure to be enticed. What has been profitable once and for a few, may not be again when open to many. No Secretary of the Treasury can forecast the result or estimate his resources a year in advance derived from a commodity subject to so many contingencies.

If spirits were to remain warehoused to ripen in anything like equal time from the date of their entry, then when the time arrives for the payment of the tax upon the production of 1880 it will be more than twice the amount falling due upon that of 1878, and when the tax upon the production of 1881 falls due it will be more than twice the amount of that of 1880. With an extension and perpetuation of the system a large augmentation of bonded spirits will for a time be sure to occur, and then possibly a declension may occur, bringing many interested parties to grief. Through it all it is clear to see that the Treasury will be exposed to a possible difference of not less than $30,000,000 of taxes in its receipts, contrasting one year with another, and such results cannot fail to be disadvantageous to the Government and disastrous to the whole distilling interest. Last year 117,728,150 gallons of spirits were produced, an amount greatly in excess of any possible consumption. At this rate there can be no demand for it unless we make it a legal tender.

This bill is likely to pass in some modified form, but still with some extension of the three years now allowed for spirits to remain in bond. Believing this will only postpone the evil day, and that in the end the ill effects of overproduction will be surely perpetuated and become incurable, I must decline to support the measure. Already there is an overstock of raw whisky which the holders are in haste to ripen, and so soon as there is an overstock of rectified and of fully ripened whisky, the distillers may bid farewell to any assured and regular profits upon their business. The Government will also then find itself with an unstable and precarious revenue.

The difficulty now arises primarily from the bonding period of three years, and secondly from the agitation of the repeal or partial repeal of the tax on spirits. The first mistake is now not easily to be remedied. The last might be if the House of Representatives should send us a bill fixing the tax, without too large a concession, where it would be likely to remain and endure permanently. With such an arrangement there would be no loss of revenue to the Government, and those engaged in the business of distilling spirituous liquors would be vastly better off than they are likely to be with an extension of an experiment which has already brought forth bitter fruits, with the promise of a greater similar harvest in the near future.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I wish to say just one word. I have very decided views on this question, but I shall not undertake to ask the Senate to hear me until the bill itself comes before us from the committee. I wish to be enlightened by the committee, and shall not attempt to enlighten the committee myself. I hope the committee will report the bill at a very early date, so that I may be heard upon the measure itself.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, without the slightest reflection upon the gentlemen who have been taking part in this discussion, I cannot but regard it as a very anomalous thing. The House of Representatives passed and sent a bill here relating to the period for the bonding of distilled spirits. It was referred to the Committee on Finance three or four weeks ago. The committee proceeded to consider the bill; and pending that consideration a very grave suggestion or a charge was made by an honorable Senator of this body in respect of the means by which that bill passed the House of Representatives and by which its passage was to be effected in the Senate. The result was that upon the motion of that honorable Senator a special committee was raised for the purpose of inquiring into the facts. Nothing else could be done and nothing less could be done than such an inquiry, which I trust the honorable Senator having it in charge will continue, and probe to the very bottom.

But in the mean time, in the orderly and usual consideration of its measures the Committee on Finance had proceeded; and (without improperly referring to the action in committee) I think I may say, in accordance with the facts which were published to the world in all the papers, that on Friday last this subject was committed with instructions to two members of that committee, the honorable Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] for one and me for the other, and that we have met and performed the duty assigned us by the committee, and the result of our labors is probably in print as I speak; it will be reported to the whole committee to-morrow morning at their regular meeting hour, and I fully expect that it will be reported back to the Senate at twelve o'clock to-morrow when the Senate meets.

When that measure amended, or in whatever shape it may be presented to the Senate, comes up, it will be exceedingly proper at any time to have it discussed and acted upon. It touches a very important question of public revenue; it touches a very important branch of the business of the country. It involves not simply the manufacture of distilled spirits, but it connects itself importantly with the food question of the country; it connects itself importantly with the foreign commerce of the country. There is no branch of public business but what is interlaced, intertwined with all others.

This business of distilling has been made compulsory upon a great many, or rather the production from stills has been made compulsory upon a very large interest in this country by the contracts made to feed swine and cattle with the slop from the distilleries. The contracts cannot be made for a month, but they must be made for a continuous season, during which time distillation must continue, profitable or unprofitable, for the purpose of fulfilling these large beef and swine contracts. Therefore under these circumstances an accumulation of one portion of this business, that is the production of distilled spirits, has gone on compulsorily, and there is no doubt the market has been overstocked. The distillers cannot arrest the production because their business engagements in the line of connection I have mentioned compel them to continue their distillation, whether profitable or not.

Another fact has occurred. A proposition has been made in the other House to diminish the tax upon whisky nearly one-half, to make it 50 cents instead of 90 cents a gallon. The tax is to-day nearly five or six times the value of the product upon which the tax is laid. The system is, as the Senate can see, a highly artificial system, to create an article the value of which is to the Government five-sixths of the whole, and to the owner but the remaining one-sixth. Every regulation that affects an article so egregiously taxed—I do not say improperly—becomes important. Every regulation affects it. Every proposition to change the tax, either to lower it or to increase it, necessarily has a very large effect upon the market. The proposition to diminish that tax from 90 to 50 cents has paralyzed the trade and prevented consumption, because obviously no one desires to anticipate a supply which can be had at a lower rate by delaying the purchase. Therefore, all purchases have been delayed, waiting this promised or expected diminution in the duty that they may buy at a lower rate by delay.

This is the condition of this matter. It must be treated by Congress as a simple business proposition, in which those engaged in it, those who make this supply of a product so fruitful of revenue to the country, must not be treated otherwise than the other important and honorable business of this country. I can understand the vein of resentment that ran through the remarks of the Senator from Kentucky, in which he seemed to consider that there was an impugnment of a large body of his constituents engaged in this traffic, simply by reason of the nature of their traffic. Without commenting at all upon his facts or his views as to the wisdom of this bill, because this bill is not before us, and I shall have something to say, probably, when it does come before us, I merely wish to remark that this is a business proposition; it is a revenue law. The parties engaged in this business are citizens of the United States; their business is as honest and as honorable as any other, and we are to treat it, when it does come before the Senate in a proper shape, precisely in accordance with the true laws of economy from beginning to end.

I hope, sir, that this bill will be brought into the Senate to-morrow in the amended shape which the committee has directed, and that when it comes here it will be soon disposed of by the Senate. Large and important interests await the decision of Congress. There is a great deal of apprehension lest Congress may adjourn without action on this subject; and when the bill has been brought before the Senate, I trust that there will be no unnecessary delay in dealing finally and certainly and justly by the very important subject to which it relates, but I apprehend the present discussion has been premature.

Mr. WINDOM. I should like to make a single remark in reply to the Senator from Delaware on this subject. The Senator from Delaware, without intending it, has placed me in a false position as to what I stated some days ago. I did not say anything about means by which the bill passed the House of Representatives. I never intimated, for I never had a suspicion, that any member of the House of Representatives or of the Senate had been improperly influenced. I never intimated, therefore, that any improper means had been used on any member of Congress. I did say this: that I was informed by what I believed to be good authority that very large sums of money had been raised for the purpose of promoting the passage of this measure. Whether I was correctly informed I do not know, and I so stated on that occasion; but the fact stated by the Senator from Kentucky to-day, if the investigation reveals nothing else, was certainly enough to furnish a foundation for that statement.

I had been told of firms being taxed $5,000; I had been told of other very large sums of money being raised, and believing, as I then did, and now do, that this bill opens a wider door for fraud than any I have ever known in my twenty-odd years' experience in Congress, I, with others, came to the conclusion that this money was raised for that purpose. I propose to go on with this investigation and give these gentlemen an opportunity to explain, but I repeat that the remarks made by the Senator from Kentucky are ample to justify the belief of those who were not in the secret, as he seems to have been, of what was going on, that this money was raised for some purpose which was worthy of investigation. It was raised, as I understand from the Senator from Kentucky, about the time that the parties came here; I will not call it a ring, but about the time that the friends of this measure came here for the purpose of passing the bill. Am I mistaken in that? The money being raised about that time, and taking that fact in connection with the character of the bill, when we are told that $600,000 was raised in that way, I think I was justified in asking an investigation. If there is nothing else but what the Senator from Kentucky has said, I am perfectly willing and shall be glad to say to the Senate that I was mistaken in its purpose. But what I rose to say was that I never in the most distant manner implicated or attempted to implicate any Senator or member of the House in any matter connected with this money transaction.

One word further, Mr. President. I do not want to discuss this measure at present; I propose to do that when it comes before the Senate; but I differ with the Senator from Kentucky as widely as it is possible for one Senator to differ from another in the construction to be placed upon this bill. I shall attempt to show when the bill comes before the Senate what I now believe, that if you put together all the doubtful measures which have come before Congress during the last twenty-five years, they do not altogether open as wide a door for defrauding the Government as does this bill.

Mr. CONGER. I rose for the purpose of moving that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business, but I am informed that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] desires to go on with some remarks upon the bill now pending before the Senate. If he wishes to do so, I yield.

Mr. SHERMAN. What is the pending bill?

Mr. PLUMB. I was under the impression that there was unfinished business before the Senate, but it seems I was mistaken. I have nothing to say. The Senate may proceed as it sees fit.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Michigan move an executive session?

Mr. ALLISON. I ask for the regular order first.

Mr. CONGER. If the Senator from Kansas desires to go on with his remarks this evening I shall not make the motion.

Mr. PLUMB. I have changed my mind. I have no remarks to make on the subject. I have given way, as the Senate has taken the business out of my hands entirely. I am content now with whatever order the presiding officer and the Senate shall take.

Mr. SHERMAN. What is the unfinished business?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business will be laid before the Senate.

The PRINCIPAL LEGISLATIVE CLERK. "A bill (S. No. 67) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to ascertain and certify the amount of land located with military warrants in the States described therein, and for other purposes."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would state that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] had the right by courtesy to address the Senate at two o'clock.

Mr. BECK. My resolution may be indefinitely postponed or withdrawn, I do not care which.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is Senate bill No. 67. Does the Senator from Kentucky wish any disposition made of his resolution?

Mr. BECK. Let it be indefinitely postponed.

The resolution was postponed indefinitely.

MILITARY LAND-WARRANT LOCATIONS.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill (S. No. 67) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to ascertain and certify the amount of land located with military warrants in the States described therein, and for other purposes.

Mr. MORGAN. I offer an amendment to the bill with a view of having it printed. Let it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment will be read.

The PRINCIPAL LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed to insert as an additional section the following:

SEC. 3. None of the money to which any State shall become entitled under this act shall be retained by the United States on account of any deposits of public money made with any State under the provisions of "An act to regulate the deposits of the public money," approved June 23, 1836, nor shall any of such money be retained by the United States for or on account of any direct tax remaining due and unpaid from any State or the people of any State or their property, to the United States under "An act to provide increased revenue from imports, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1861. And any sums of money apportioned to either of the States under the last-mentioned act as taxes remaining due to the United States, and any sum of money remaining due to the United States from any of the States under each of the aforementioned acts, is hereby remitted; and such debts, from and after the passage of this act, are canceled and discharged.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had this day approved and signed the act (S. No. 328) to provide for the sale of the lands of the Miami Indians in Kansas.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 6018) to amend section 4919 of the Revised Statutes, relating to the recovery of damages for the infringement of patents; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 145) to pay Frank L. Donnelly as page of the Forty-fifth Congress.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 3208) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, and for the armament thereof, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. No. 4466) making appropriations for the Agricultural Department of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, submitting a copy of a letter from the Commissioner of Pensions inviting attention to the fact that the "deficiency" appropriation of $16,000,000 to meet the June payment of Army pensions should be available as early as the 25th instant, if practicable, in order to avoid any delay in payment.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, May 15, 1882.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a communication, dated the 11th instant, from the Secretary of the Interior, together with estimate of appropriation and accompanying papers, to provide in accordance with treaty stipulations and existing laws for the payment of certain interest due the Osage Indians.

The subject is presented for the consideration of Congress.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, May 15, 1882.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which, on motion of Mr. HOAR, was ordered to lie on the table and be printed:

To the Senate of the United States:

I transmit herewith a report of the Secretary of State with accompanying papers, submitted in response to the Senate resolution of the 21st of March last, requesting a copy of instructions given to Mr. George F. Seward, when minister to China, concerning Chinese immigration, &c., and Mr. Seward's dispatches on that subject.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, May 15, 1882.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 6018) to amend section 4919 of the Revised Statutes, relating to the recovery of damages for the infringement of patents, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 145) to pay Frank Donnelly as page of the Forty-fifth Congress, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. LAPHAM asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1886) donating four condemned cast-iron cannon for the soldiers' monument at the village of East Bloomfield, New York; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. JACKSON (by request) asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1887) for the payment of certain awards in favor of parties therein named; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

THE CIVIL SERVICE.

Mr. HAWLEY submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That 2,000 extra copies of the report and evidence accompanying Senate bill No. 133 be printed for the use of the Senate.

REPORT WITHDRAWN.

Mr. MCMILLAN. This morning I reported from the Committee on Commerce the bill (S. No. 1810) to authorize the Rock Island and Southwestern Railway Company to construct a bridge over the Mississippi River at New Boston, State of Illinois. I ask leave to withdraw the bill as reported for the purpose of making a correction in the amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Leave is granted, there being no objection.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CONGER. I now renew the motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and seventeen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at five o'clock and fifty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

SALE OF BROOKLYN NAVY-YARD.

Mr. BLISS introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6228) to provide for the sale and removal of the navy-yard at Brooklyn, New York; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BLISS. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a communication from the mayor of Brooklyn and some resolutions adopted by the city council of Brooklyn upon this subject. This correspondence is in reply to a request by the Committee on Appropriations of this House made to me to obtain some expression of opinion on the part of the city authorities of Brooklyn in reference to the sale of the Brooklyn navy-yard.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The communication and resolutions are as follows:

MAYOR'S OFFICE,
Brooklyn, New York, May 13, 1882.

DEAR SIR: In response to your communication with reference to the proposed removal of the New York navy-yard from Brooklyn, I have the honor to inclose a copy of resolutions passed by the board of aldermen on Monday last in answer to your inquiry.

These resolutions, I believe, represent fairly the sentiment of our people so far as Brooklyn alone is concerned. While, as mayor of Brooklyn, I have signed the resolutions, I cannot refrain from saying that in my own judgment the interests of the port and of the country demand emphatically that there should be a navy-yard somewhere in the harbor of New York.

I am, dear sir, respectfully,

SETH LOW, Mayor.

Hon. ARCH. M. BLISS, Washington, D. C.

CITY CLERK'S OFFICE, Brooklyn, May 12, 1882.

SIR: You are hereby notified that at a meeting of the common council, held on Monday, May 8, 1882, a resolution, of which the annexed is a copy, was adopted:

Whereas an expression of opinion on the part of the mayor and common council of this city has been requested as to the interest of the city in connection with the proposed removal of the Brooklyn navy-yard:

Resolved, That in the judgment of this board the interests of Brooklyn will be greatly promoted by the removal of said navy-yard, thereby opening to private enterprise the valuable water-front and large extent of land now held by the General Government, and we earnestly request our representatives in Congress to favor the removal of the same.

Resolved, That the city clerk be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to transmit a copy of the above to our representatives of Congress.

The above resolution was approved by the mayor on the 13th day of May, 1882.

Attest:

[SEAL.] WILLIAM J. TATE, City Clerk.

BUILDING IN WHICH PRESIDENT LINCOLN DIED.

Mr. HENDERSON. I ask unanimous consent to offer for adoption the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be authorized and directed to inquire into the propriety of purchasing for public use the south half of lot numbered 14, in square numbered 347, in the city of Washington and District of Columbia, with the appurtenances thereunto belonging, and for what sum the same can be purchased; and that they report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. HENDERSON. I hope there will be no objection to the adoption of this resolution. It simply directs the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to inquire into the propriety of purchasing a certain lot therein described.

Mr. REAGAN. For what purpose?

Mr. HENDERSON. The building in which Abraham Lincoln, late President of the United States, died, is situated on this lot.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and adopted.

Mr. HENDERSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. This being the third Monday of the month, the regular order under the rules is the consideration of motions to suspend the rules, preference being given on this day to motions made under instruction of committees.

Mr. RANDALL. From the announcement just made, I presume the Chair does not hold that the special order relating to national banks is of such a character as to interfere with the order of business just stated by the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not been called on to decide that question. He thinks it his duty under the rules to proceed with the call of committees for motions to suspend the rules.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman in charge of the bank bill does not call it up.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has not called it up. On the third Monday of last month the Committee on Education and Labor was the last committee called for a motion to suspend the rules. The next committee in order under this call is the Committee on the Militia.

REORGANIZATION OF THE MILITIA.

Mr. STRAIT. I am directed by the Committee on the Militia to move that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4705) to amend title 16 of the Revised Statutes, relative to the militia, and that the same be now put on its passage.

Mr. SPRINGER. I wish to demand a second upon this motion.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the entire bill be read?

The SPEAKER. It will be.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to demand a second.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] has already given notice of his intention to demand a second. The Chair holds that it is in order to make that demand immediately after the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That every able-bodied male citizen resident within the respective States and Territories, between the ages of eighteen and forty-five, shall be enrolled in the militia, and said enrollment shall be made at such times and in such manner as may be provided by the laws of each State and Territory respectively.

SEC. 2. That the militia shall be divided into two classes: the active, to be known as the national guard; and the inactive, to be known as the reserve militia.

SEC. 3. That the national guard shall consist of such regularly uniformed and enlisted troops in the several States and Territories as are or may be organized therein in pursuance of the laws of the respective States and Territories: Provided, however, That the first term of enlistment in no State or Territory shall be for a less period than three years, and all enlistments shall be made with the provision that if it should expire during a time when the soldier is in the service of the United States it shall continue until the expiration of the time for which he was called into such service.

SEC. 4. That in time of peace the organization of the national guard, the numbers, rank, and duties of the staff officers, and the organization of bureaus of administration in the militia of the several States and Territories, shall be such as the Legislatures thereof may from time to time direct: Provided, however, That such organization shall conform as closely to the methods prescribed for the Regular Army as the circumstances of the various States and Territories will permit: And provided further, That when ordered on active duty by the President of the United States, the National Guard may be organized by him into brigades and divisions, as the public interests may, in his opinion, require; and he may assign and designate the commanders of such brigades and divisions; and the numbers, rank, and duties of the staff officers shall be the same as prescribed for the Regular Army.

SEC. 5. That the active militia shall be trained in accordance with the same system of tactics that may from time to time be prescribed for corresponding arms of the service in the Regular Army.

SEC. 6. That in time of peace the number of active militia for which each State or Territory shall be entitled to receive its apportionment of the appropriations made by this act shall not exceed five hundred regularly uniformed commissioned officers and enlisted men for each Representative or Delegate to which such State or Territory is entitled in the Congress of the United States.

SEC. 7. That for all the purposes of this act the District of Columbia shall be accounted and treated as a Territory entitled to one Delegate in Congress.

SEC. 8. That the annual sum of $1,000,000 is hereby appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of providing small-arms, field artillery and harness, infantry, cavalry, and horse equipments, and other ordnance stores, service-dress, tents, camp equipage, and other quartermaster stores, for the active militia of the several States and Territories and for other purposes covered by this act; and said appropriation shall be apportioned among the several States and Territories on the books of the Ordnance Department by the Chief of Ordnance of the Army, under the direction of the Secretary of War, according to the number of Representatives or Delegates to which each State and Territory respectively is entitled in the Congress of the United States: Provided, however, That each State and Territory shall only be entitled to the benefits of so much of the appropriation apportioned to it as the proportion of the number of its regularly enlisted, organized, and uniformed active militia, as determined by the preceding annual report of the Secretary of War, bears to the maximum number of active militia for which such State or Territory is entitled to the benefits of this act; and no State or Territory shall receive any portion of the appropriation apportioned to it unless it shall have complied with the provisions of this act. And the amount of said appropriation which is thus determined not to be available shall, after deducting the special expenditures authorized by this act, be covered back into the Treasury of the United States: And provided further, That the said appropriation shall be apportioned and applied without reference to the condition of accounts between any State or Territory and the General Government at the time of the passage of this act; and that all serviceable arms and equipments that have heretofore been furnished by the United States and are now in possession of the respective States and Territories shall be counted as part of this allowance and shall be annually accounted for in the same manner as herein provided for arms and equipments hereafter issued: And provided further, That if any State or Territory shall fail to comply with those provisions of this act on which the issue of arms and equipments for its active militia are conditioned, if such failure or omission is, in the opinion of the Secretary of War, immaterial or unavoidable, he may authorize such issue. And that for the first year under the operation of the provisions of this act the number of regularly enlisted, organized, and uniformed active militia in each State or Territory may be determined by certificates from the respective governors thereof, and the appropriation apportioned accordingly.

SEC. 9. That the purchase or manufacture and the issue to States and Territories of arms, ammunition, service dress, equipments, ordnance stores, and camp equipage for the active militia, under the provisions of this act, shall be made by the Chief of Ordnance of the Army, under the direction of the Secretary of War, and they shall remain the property of the United States, and be annually accounted for to the Chief of Ordnance of the Army by the governors of the States and Territories, for which purpose the Chief of Ordnance of the Army, under the direction of the Secretary of War, shall prescribe and supply the necessary blanks, and make such regulations as he may deem necessary to protect the said property of the United States.

SEC. 10. That loss of, or damage to, arms, equipments, ordnance stores, and camp equipage, except the ordinary wear and accidents of service, shall be made good to the United States by the person or persons chargeable therewith, as in like cases in the Regular Army; and money received from sales or on account of loss or damages shall be accounted for to the Chief of Ordnance of the Army and paid into the Treasury of the United States.

SEC. 11. That all arms, equipments, ordnance stores, or camp equipage which may become unserviceable or unsuitable shall be examined by a board of officers of the national guard, and its report shall be forwarded by the governor of the State or Territory to the Chief of Ordnance of the Army for the action of the Secretary of War, who shall direct what disposition, by sale or otherwise, shall be made of them.

SEC. 12. That there shall be an adjutant-general in each State and Territory, who shall perform such duties as may be prescribed by the laws of each State and Territory respectively, and who shall, on or before the last day of October in each year, make a return to the War Department, in such form as shall from time to time be prescribed by the Secretary of War, of the number of enrolled militia, the number of enlisted, organized, and uniformed active militia, of the results of the annual inspection of the active militia and military property in each State, and of the results and scores of the rifle practice of the active militia. He shall also make such special reports as may from time to time be required by the Secretary of War.

SEC. 13. That the Secretary of War shall, with his annual report of each year, transmit to Congress an abstract of the annual returns of the adjutant-generals of the States and Territories, with such observations thereon as he may deem necessary for the information of Congress.

SEC. 14. That each State or Territory receiving any part of the appropriations hereby made shall, as soon as practicable after the passage of this act, cause its active militia to be provided with a complete service dress and equipment of the pattern selected as herein prescribed, which shall be worn when such active militia are called out for active service, and when in the performance of any duty, drill, parade, or ceremony prescribed by this act: Provided, however, That the same may also be worn at such other times as the military authorities of the State or Territory may direct: And provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed to prohibit the wearing at other times of any full dress uniform permitted by the military authorities of the States or Territories: And provided further, That serviceable clothing and equipments in use at the time of the passage of this act need not be replaced.

SEC. 15. That each State and Territory receiving any part of the appropriations hereby made shall require every organization in its active militia to go into camp of instruction for at least five consecutive days in each year, and to assemble for drill and instruction not less than once in each calendar month, and shall require an annual inspection of its active militia to be made by an officer or officers thereof, whose duty it shall be to report the result of such inspection to the adjutant-general thereof, stating the number of such active militia, the actual condition of their arms, accouterments, ammunition, and equipment, their deficiencies, and every other particular relating to the advancement of their organization and discipline.

SEC. 16. That notice shall be given by the adjutant-general of each State and Territory to the Secretary of War of the time and place of the annual inspections of the active militia of his State or Territory; and thereupon the President shall detail an officer from the active or retired list of the Army to accompany the State inspector during his inspection, and observe the general condition of the troops and public property, with the consent and under the general direction of the governor of such State or Territory; and, while so detailed, retired officers shall, in addition to their pay as retired officers, be allowed and paid the actual traveling and other expenses incurred by them in the performance of the duty: Provided, however, That such officer shall have no authority in any way to control or interfere with the State inspector, or to exercise any power or authority during such inspection over the officers or men inspected. He shall make a report in duplicate, and transmit one copy to the governor of such State or Territory and another to the Secretary of War, of such matters as shall in his judgment require to be brought to their attention.

SEC. 17. That each State receiving any portion of the annual appropriations made by this act shall within one year after the passage of this act provide and equip at least one rifle range, and shall maintain the same for the instruction of its militia in rifle practice, and require them to be instructed therein.

SEC. 18. That the Secretary of War is authorized, out of the annual appropriation herein made, to offer annually to the regularly organized and uniformed active militia of each State and Territory (provided they number at least seven hundred men) a prize, not to exceed $100 in value, for competition in rifle practice; also to annually offer a prize of $1,000 to be shot for by a "team" or detachments from the active militia of each State and Territory, from each of the three divisions of the Army, and from the Navy, to be divided among the three "teams" standing highest in such match; the terms and conditions of both matches to be prescribed by the Secretary of War.

Each State team shall be certified to by the adjutant-general of its State as consisting of its regularly enlisted and uniformed national guard; and transportation to and from said last-named match shall be furnished out of such appropriation to such a team and reserve, not to exceed fifteen in number from each State, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War.

SEC. 19. That upon the application of any regimental, division, or brigade commander of the national guard of any State or Territory, the governor thereof may apply to the Secretary of War to assign an officer from the active or retired list of the Army to act as adjutant of such regiment, or assistant adjutant-general or chief of staff of such brigade or division. Whenever the public interests will admit, the Secretary of War is authorized to assign such officer for such duty with his consent.

Officers so assigned shall be commissioned as officers in such national guard by the governor of such State or Territory, and shall hold such commissions during his pleasure. While performing such duty they shall give their entire time, or so much thereof as shall be necessary to properly perform the duties of their office, shall be subject to the rules and regulations of such national guard while so assigned, and shall receive the full pay and emoluments of their rank in the regular Army as on detached service.

No assignment shall be made of any officer for this duty to the prejudice of the regular Army, nor unless he shall have seen at least three years' service in the field. All such assignments may be revoked at pleasure by the Secretary of War by giving notice thereof to the governor of the State. Upon receipt of such notice by the latter, the officer whose assignment is so revoked shall cease to be an officer of the national guard of such State or Territory, and shall be honorably discharged therefrom by its governor.

SEC. 20. That the President of the United States may order the whole or any part of the active militia of any State or Territory on active duty, for a period not exceeding twelve months, during war or an invasion, or apprehended invasion, by a foreign enemy or Indian tribe, or an insurrection or rebellion against the Constitution and laws of the United States, or upon the imminent danger of either, or on any occasion in which the execution of the laws may be obstructed by combinations and forces too strong to be overcome by the civil authorities in the ordinary course of law, and to issue his orders for that purpose to such officers of the active militia as he may think proper; and the said force, when ordered on active duty, shall, from the time such order is issued, be subject to the Rules and Articles of War and to the regulations of the Army, and shall, for all purposes whatsoever, be, and shall be considered, in the actual service of the United States, and shall be allowed the same pay, rations, and emoluments as are allowed to officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates of like grades and arms in the regular service; and in case of wounds or injuries received in the line of duty, or in case of being killed in the performance of such duty, the same provisions shall be extended to them, their widows and children, as are provided by law in like cases to officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates of like grades belonging to the regular Army of the United States.

SEC. 21. That any officer or enlisted man of the active militia who, upon being ordered into the service of the United States, shall refuse or fail to obey said order without giving a valid excuse therefor, to be established by his oath and verified by the testimony of two credible and disinterested witnesses, may be tried by court-martial for desertion, and subject to the fines and penalties as in such cases provided.

SEC. 22. That when called into the service of the United States, officers of the same grade in the active militia shall take precedence according to the date of their commissions. In case two of the same grade have commissions of equal date their rank shall be determined by lot, to be drawn by them before their commanding officer, unless their relative rank is prescribed by regulation.

SEC. 23. That mounted officers and members of mounted companies in the active militia called into the service of the United States shall each receive such consideration for use and risk of private horses actually used by them as may be awarded by a board of officers appointed by the Secretary of War. The same allowances of forage shall be made for private horses used by the militia in the service of the United States as for horses owned by the United States.

SEC. 24. That the reserve militia shall not be liable or subject to any military duty to the United States except when called into service by act of Congress passed for that purpose.

SEC. 25. That as soon as practicable after the passage of this act the President shall appoint a board of seven officers, two of whom shall be of the Army and five selected from the active militia of the Eastern, Middle, Southern, Western, and Pacific States, respectively. Said board shall prepare a system of rules and regulations for the discipline of the active militia, which rules and regulations shall be submitted by the President to Congress at its next ensuing session for approval and enactment. Said board shall also recommend a service dress for the active militia, which, upon being approved by the President, shall be the uniform of the active militia when called into service. Said board shall also recommend an allowance of ammunition and the kinds and allowance of camp equipage to be issued to the active militia in time of peace, which, upon being approved by the President, shall govern the Chief of Ordnance in the issue of those articles under the provisions of this act. The five officers of said board appointed from the active militia shall, during the time they are engaged in the performance of the duties prescribed herein for said board, receive the pay and emoluments allowed by law to a colonel of infantry. The amount of money necessary for the payment of their services, and also for the payment of such expenses incurred by said board in the performance of its duties as may be approved by the Secretary of War, is hereby appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, however, That the total amount of money so to be paid shall not exceed $3,000.

SEC. 26. That sections 1625 to 1661, inclusive, of the Revised Statutes, and all other acts and parts of acts inconsistent herewith, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. SPRINGER. I demand a second on the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. STRAIT.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to considering a second as ordered?

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. I object.

Mr. STRAIT and Mr. SPRINGER having been appointed tellers, the House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 88, noes 3.

So the motion to suspend the rules was seconded.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STRAIT] is recognized to control the time for debate in support of his motion; and assuming that the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPRINGER,] who demanded the second, is opposed to the motion, he will be recognized to control the time in opposition.

Mr. STRAIT. I ask that the report of the Committee on the Militia accompanying this bill be read.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read in the time allowed to the gentleman from Minnesota for debate.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on the Militia, to whom have been referred the petitions of the National Guard Association and of the officers of the militia of various States for amendment of the militia law, respectfully report:

That the militia law not having been materially modified since its original enactment in 1792, the provisions of the law have become obsolete and impracticable. That a revision of the law is both desirable and necessary to adapt it to the changes of time and circumstances is too obvious to need argument. The petitions which have been referred to the committee for consideration present such a fair and concise statement of facts that we insert their recital as part of our report:

"The National Guard Association of the United States, composed of delegates from the active militia of the various States, respectfully represents:

"That the existing militia law has for many years been inoperative, for the reason that changes of circumstances and condition since its original enactment in 1792 would make any attempt to enforce its provisions now both absurd and impracticable. The law requires military duty from every citizen between eighteen and forty-five years of age, and requires each individual to provide himself with arms, ammunition, and knapsack. If the law should be enforced, the armed militia force of the country would amount to nearly seven million men. In place of the militia required by this law, the States have fostered volunteer militia organizations, which have gradually increased until now they constitute the only actual militia force. Several causes operate to hinder the efforts of the volunteer militia to perfect their organization, among which we would designate—

"First. The fact that they are not recognized by Federal laws.

"Second. That the annual appropriation of $200,000 for the militia, originally enacted in 1808, is entirely inadequate to properly equip the existing volunteer force.

"Third. That owing to the phraseology of the law, the purpose of the annual appropriation is limited to supplying arms and equipments, and that camp equipage, clothing, blankets, and other articles absolutely needed by the militia cannot be procured by them, except in those States that make State appropriations to supply them.

"We deem it unnecessary to present any argument as to the absolute necessity, under our form of government, of a well-organized, well-instructed militia, thoroughly equipped and ready for instant use. Hitherto such militia has only existed through the necessities of some of the individual States, or the voluntary exertions of a few individuals. We believe that the militia law requires thorough revision to adapt it to the militia organizations that time has demonstrated to be the only practicable ones.

"We are opposed to any change in the relations between the Federal Government and the militia that have now become well established by long custom. We are opposed to any change in the relative authority now exercised by the Federal and State governments over the militia, and we are opposed to any interference in the existing militia organizations of the States or the creation of a new force. But we do most earnestly recommend and urge that the law should be adapted to the changes that have occurred in the organization of the militia, and make a necessary provision for them.

"We therefore recommend and ask that the existing militia law be amended as follows:

"1st. To divide the enrolled militia into two classes, the active and inactive.

"2d. To recognize the volunteer militia organizations of the respective States as the 'active militia.'

"3d. To increase the annual appropriation for the militia to $1,000,000.

"4th. To provide that the annual appropriation be applied to furnishing clothing and camp equipage, as well as arms and equipments, or, when desired by any State, may be applied to the payments of its militia for duty in annual camps of instruction."

These petitions come from the officers of the militia of nearly all the States, and may therefore be accepted as expressing the defects they have found in the practical operation of existing law, and the remedy which experience has suggested to them. The committee, after a full consideration of the subject, are satisfied that the recommendations made in these petitions present the most satisfactory solution of the militia question that has yet been proposed. We have accordingly framed a bill to amend the law in accordance with these recommendations, and report the same herewith, in the hope that the House will give the subject the attention which its importance demands.

The committee of the Forty-sixth Congress made such a thorough investigation and exhaustive report on the militia (see Report 763, Forty-sixth Congress, second session) that we deem it unnecessary for us to review the whole question. We would therefore merely state that the bill we report strikes from the existing law all of its obsolete provisions, and inserts others that recognize and provide for the system of volunteer militia that has grown up in place of the enrolled militia recognized by existing law, and that it does not interfere with or change the relative control of the General Government and the States over the militia, either as limited by existing law or as fixed by custom.

Mr. STRAIT. I ask that a portion of the report of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs relating to this subject be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A simple statement of fact appears to be a sufficient response to the resolution of the Senate. That an appropriation fixed in 1808 to provide for seventeen States with a population of 8,000,000 is inadequate to provide for thirty-eight States with a population of 50,000,000 needs no argument. The Chief of Ordnance has for many years urged Congress to increase the appropriation; it was considered and favorably reported to the Senate by this committee in the Forty-fifth Congress, and we think it would be difficult to conceive any reasonable argument against it.

In connection with a favorable consideration of the proposition to increase the appropriation, there are other points connected with it to which the committee deem it proper to call attention.

The existing law is very crude; it simply provides as follows:

"SEC. 1661. The annual sum of $200,000 is appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of providing arms and equipments for the whole body of the militia, either by purchase or manufacture, by and on account of the United States."

It will be perceived that no provision is made as to the mode of apportioning the appropriation between the States, no requirements for accountability for the property furnished, or limitation on the disposition that the States may make of it. The greatest defect of the law, however, is that it does not allow the furnishing of tents and other articles necessary to provide for camps of instruction. To this omission of the law is largely due the disparity between the different States in the strength and efficiency of the militia.

Your committee have deemed it proper, in addition to recommending an increase of the appropriation, to recommend also that the defects of the law relative to it be remedied. We accordingly report herewith a bill to increase the annual appropriation to $600,000, and making provisions for its apportionment, and for the care, accountability, and disposition of property issued under it. We also provide in the bill that each State shall only receive such proportion of the amount apportioned to it as the actual number of its active militia bears to a fixed maximum, and we believe this provision wisely calculated to foster and encourage the formation of volunteer organizations in those States where but few now exist.

There have been no material changes in the law relative to the organization of the militia since its original enactment in 1792, and it is obvious that many of its provisions are now obsolete and many amendments desirable.

Your committee, however, deem the increase of the annual appropriation to be a matter of such apparent propriety that it is not likely to excite either opposition or debate, and we therefore report this bill for that special purpose, reserving the subject of a general revision of the law for more mature consideration.

Mr. STRAIT. I now yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BAYNE.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized in support of the bill, and has six minutes.

Mr. BAYNE. Mr. Speaker, the question presented by this bill is whether or not the Congress of the United States desires to encourage and foster the militia organizations of the several States. Under existing law, although an annual appropriation of $200,000 is made by Congress, there is in point of fact absolutely no connection whatever between the militia forces of the States and the Government of the United States. The law of 1792 as amended in 1795, in 1808, in 1810, and at various other times, is absolutely a dead letter. It has no application or force whatever at the present time. If it were rigorously enforced, as all laws relating to military discipline should be enforced, there would be to-day in the several States of this Union an organized militia of nearly seven million people. But the law is utterly impracticable; it is dead. There can be no enforcement of that law. Consequently I say that if Congress desires to foster and encourage the organization of militia forces in the several States, a bill of the character of that now under consideration must be passed.

The provisions of this bill are very simple. It divides the militia forces of the several States into two classes, the active and the inactive. The active forces are those that now constitute what may be called the volunteer militia of the several States. In a great many of the States there are now militia organizations, and all of these, so far as the laws of the United States are concerned, are volunteer organizations. It is proposed by this bill to make an appropriation of $1,000,000 in order to sustain and support these volunteer organizations, which are denominated by this bill the active militia. The inactive militia comprises those persons in the various States who are between the ages of eighteen and forty-five years, but who do not identify themselves actively with any militia organization.

This bill also provides this money shall be so distributed that it shall not provide a force in any one Congressional district to a greater extent than five hundred. Although a million dollars is named as the annual appropriation, probably not all that sum will be consumed in any one year, and for this reason: the appropriation is not to be applied unless there are organizations which require its use. The appropriation of $1,000,000 in this bill is really an incentive toward the organization of a volunteer militia force in the several States.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a qustion?

Mr. BAYNE. Certainly.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. Has the gentleman from Pennsylvania any data upon which he can give any assurance to this House that $1,000,000 or even $5,000,000 will cover the expenses under this bill?

Mr. BAYNE. I do not say that a million of dollars would cover the expense. I only say this is in harmony with the original act of 1792, enacted by one of the very first Congresses of the United States, and which was designed to foster to the fullest extent such a militia organization. It is intended that Congress shall foster and encourage this volunteer militia in the several States.

Mr. HISCOCK. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. BAYNE. Yes, sir.

Mr. HISCOCK. I should like to inquire of the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether the original legislation on this subject was not upon the theory that the national Goverment should be defended through the States, and against the idea of a standing Army and the protection of the General Government by itself, and whether that idea has not long been obsolete?

Mr. BAYNE. If that idea has become obsolete, then I will reply to the gentleman from New York that a part of the Constitution of the United States has also become obsolete, for there are divers provisions in that instrument which require the militia in the several States shall be organized and that the Government of the United States may call on it to aid the United States troops in enforcing the law. The President of the United States only the other day inquired as to whether or not he could call on the militia of Arizona to aid in suppressing the cow-boy insurrection there, as he himself had doubts on the subject.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is now recognized to control the fifteen minutes in opposition under the rules.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the passage of this bill. It seeks to organize the entire militia force of the several States, enrolling every able-bodied man between the ages of eighteen and forty-five, and provides for putting all that force under the control of the President of the United States. Section 20 provides as follows:

SEC. 20. That the President of the United States may order the whole or any part of the active militia of any State or Territory on active duty, for a period not exceeding twelve months, during war or an invasion, or apprehended invasion, by a foreign enemy or Indian tribe, or an insurrection or rebellion against the Constitution and laws of the United States, or upon the imminent danger of either, or on any occasion in which the execution of the laws may be obstructed by combinations and forces too strong to be overcome by the civil authorities in the ordinary course of law, and to issue his orders for that purpose to such officers of the active militia as he may think proper; and the said force, when ordered on active duty, shall, from the time such order is issued, be subject to the rules and articles of war, and to the regulations of the Army, and shall, for all purposes whatsoever, be, and shall be considered, in the actual service of the United States, and shall be allowed the same pay, rations, and emoluments as are allowed to officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates of like grades and arms in the regular service; and in case of wounds or injuries received in the line of duty, or in case of being killed in the performance of such duty, the same provisions shall be extended to them, their widows and children, as are provided by law in like cases to officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates of like grades belonging to the regular Army of the United States.

This provision, as it will be seen, authorizes the President of the United States to call out all the militia and inaugurate a war without consulting, and without the consent of Congress, and without any regard whatever to that provision of the Constitution of the United States which has been heretofore observed, or ought to have been observed, namely——

Mr. STRAIT. I think the gentleman is in error.

Mr. SPRINGER. I cannot yield as my time is very brief. I refer to that provision of the Constitution which is to the effect that the United States shall guarantee to each State a republican form of government, and on the application of the Legislature thereof, or the governor the Legislature not being in session, shall protect each of them against domestic violence. This bill goes clear around that provision of the Constitution of the United States and invests the whole enforcement of the laws in the States in the President of the United States himself, and he may thus commit the country to the inauguration of a civil war for twelve months without consulting or receiving the assent of Congress.

When these men are called out they are to draw the same pay, be under the same regulations and articles of war as the soldiers of the regular Army, and they are to draw pensions in case they receive wounds in the service.

It is, Mr. Speaker, in my judgment, a revolution of the whole system upon which our Government has been founded.

I will now yield to the question of the gentleman from Minnesota if it is not too long.

Mr. STRAIT. I wish to say in reply to the gentleman from Illinois that the bill changes the present statute in no respect except in extending the time for three months. The present statute provides it may be done for nine months, and this extends that time only to twelve months.

Mr. SPRINGER. I speak of the law and of the Constitution, which require that the President shall use this force upon application of the Legislature of the State, or of the executive when the State Legislature cannot be convened.

Mr. BROWNE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SPRINGER. I cannot yield; my time is very brief.

Mr. BROWNE. I will ask the gentleman a very short question. I wish him to state, if he can, how under the section to which he refers, and to which attention has been called, the President would have any further power to order out the militia than he has now under the Constitution and law, which requires application to be made by the executive of the State when the Legislature cannot be convened, or of the Legislature when it is in session.

Mr. SPRINGER. I cannot yield, and hope that this will not be taken out of my time. I will only say that if this bill is enacted into a law it will change entirely the whole form of our Government in this respect. Our militia law was first enacted in 1792. The law has been in that shape from that time until now with very few modifications, which were made in 1861, 1862, and 1863, during the period of a great rebellion. We have been able to prosecute two foreign wars under that law and to put down one of the greatest rebellions of modern times; and therefore there is no necessity as far as I can see to reorganize the militia upon a different basis, or remodel the whole militia law of the country. I am opposed to the bill, and hope it will be rejected.

I now yield three minutes to the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. SPEER.]

Mr. SPEER. Mr. Speaker, I regard this bill as one of the most dangerous and insidious propositions which has been presented for action to this body since I have been a member of Congress. A similar proposition was submitted to the Committee on the Militia in the last Congress, and that committee, as I understand it, refused to commit themselves to the measure embodied in the bill; some of us certainly did. Sir, this proposition, by the terms of the bill, in my State for instance, and other gentlemen can speak for their own States, would organize a force of five thousand militiamen; it would have a camp of instruction for five days in each year; it would require the militia of the State so organized to have monthly drills, and would impose upon them all of the penalties and punishments which are enacted for mutiny and for desertions from the regular Army, with their disqualification of citizenship and the deprivation of all the rights to hold office, penalties under the laws governing the regular Army degrading and painful, as if involving moral turpitude. And this law is sought to be enacted in a time of profound peace and when there is no possible necessity for such legislation.

We are not opposed, Mr. Speaker, to a proper system of laws to organize and govern the militia. But the country does not need a bill of this character at this time. The land is filled with seasoned veterans, men who have seen actual war, who have faced real danger in time of battle, and who do not need to be instructed now by the pomp and pageantry of mimic war. The boys who wore the blue and the boys who wore the gray when they come to fight, shoulder to shoulder, as they will do if ever the time comes when this country shall need their strong arms, require no such system of instructions as this bill contemplates, nor do the necessities of the country demand the organization of a landwehr system such as this bill proposes.

I am opposed to it, sir. I know how it will take the sturdy yeomanry from the plow and from the cotton and corn fields in my country. They are tired of war and rumors of war, and military display in all of its forms. They are prompt and earnest and able to defend their country when called upon; and so it is true of all our American citizen soldiery, and so it has ever been, since the embattled farmers on the green at Concord fired the shot heard round the world and enkindled in millions of hearts the sacred fires of national liberty. [Applause.]

Mr. SPRINGER. I now yield three minutes to my colleague, [Mr. SINGLETON.]

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, the time allowed me is too short to enter upon a discussion of the general principles and complicated details of this bill. My first objection is to the present consideration of the bill. There is too much of it, and it involves so many interesting and important questions of expediency and constitutional law that it cannot be intelligently considered, explained, or discussed, under a suspension of the rules, which allow but fifteen minutes each to the friends and opponents.

Rising to oppose the bill, my share of time is but one minute, which I shall appropriate to a single objection upon the face of the bill which, when presented, should, and I think will, be fatal to its passage.

The Constitution of the United States confers upon Congress the power to organize, arm, and discipline the militia, but reserves to the States respectively the appointment of the officers. The clause to which I refer is as follows:

> Congress shall have power to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the States respectively the appointment of the officers, and the authority of training of the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress. (Article 1, section 8, clause 16.)

This power so expressly reserved to the States by the Constitution is, by the fourth section of this bill, conferred on the President of the United States, and the militia force which the bill proposes to organize under the name of "national guard" is a mere executive police, to be employed by the President of the United States without limitation as to time, place, or purpose. The bill provides for an additional army of over two hundred thousand men or more, upon whom and the President none of the safeguards of liberty or the wise restraints of the Constitution are imposed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. SPRINGER. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. ARMFIELD.]

Mr. ARMFIELD. I am opposed to this bill, among other reasons, because in my opinion if it becomes a law it will violate the Constitution of the United States. The bill provides in the second section:

> That the militia shall be divided into two classes: the active, to be known as the national guard; and the inactive, to be known as the reserve militia.

So that by the very terms of the bill the national guard becomes a part of the militia.

The bill also provides in the fourth section as follows:

> Provided further, That when ordered on active duty by the President of the United States the national guard may be organized by him into brigades and divisions, as the public interest may in his opinion require; and he may assign and designate the commanders of such brigades and divisions.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the Constitution of the United States provides in article 1, section 8, in enumerating the powers of Congress and setting forth the powers they shall have in organizing and employing the militia of the United States, as follows:

> They shall have power to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces.
> To provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections and repel invasions.
> To provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the States respectively the appointment of the officers, and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress.

So that, Mr. Speaker, in contemplation of the Constitution, even when the militia is called into the service of the United States, the respective States from which they come are to have the power and the right of appointing the officers to command and govern the militia. This bill, in violation of this provision, provides the President of the United States shall assign and designate the commanders of such brigades and divisions. To that extent it violates the Constitution of the United States; therefore, Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to it.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I left?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has two and a half minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. SPRINGER. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN.]

Mr. REAGAN. This question comes upon us without opportunity to examine past legislation or to consider the question with any degree of satisfaction. The whole bill impresses me with the idea that it is more intended to organize a dictatorship than to provide for the organization of the militia. It impresses me with the idea that it is an entire departure from the provisions and requirements of the Constitution, and that in some respects it grants powers that might be used greatly to the detriment of our system of government.

In the fourth section, in addition to things which we might empower the President to do, it is provided that when the national guard is—

Ordered on active duty by the President of the United States, the national guard may be organized by him into brigades and divisions, as the public interests may, in his opinion, require; and he may assign and designate the commanders of such brigades and divisions; and the numbers, rank, and duties of the staff officers shall be the same as prescribed for the regular Army.

The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. ARMFIELD] and also the gentleman from Illinois have just called the attention of the House to clause 16 of section 8 of the first article of the Constitution, in which it is provided that the appointment of officers and the authority of training the militia are reserved to the States. I will read the clause:

To provide for organizing the Army and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the States respectively the appointment of the officers and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress.

Mr. BAYNE. Now, let me say to the gentleman——

Mr. REAGAN. I have not time to yield in the two and a half minutes allotted to me.

I know it is a debated question under our system as to whether the general officers may be appointed by the President. The better opinion seems to me to be that which follows the terms of the Constitution itself.

Again, a more serious objection to the bill—and I regret I have not had time to look into it more fully—is to be found in its twentieth section. It provides—

That the President of the United States may order the whole or any part of the active militia of any State or Territory on active duty, for a period not exceeding twelve months, during war or an invasion, or apprehended invasion, by a foreign enemy or Indian tribe, or an insurrection or rebellion against the Constitution and laws of the United States, or upon the imminent danger of either, or on any occasion in which the execution of the laws may be obstructed by combinations and forces too strong to be overcome by the civil authorities in the ordinary course of law, and to issue his orders for that purpose to such officers of the active militia as he may think proper.

Without reading more, that brings me to the point where I will answer the argument of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. BROWNE,] that this call is to be made in the terms of the law without reference to the Constitution. It distinctly, it seems to me, authorizes a violation of the Constitution. It authorizes the President to take charge of this militia force of the State without the consent of the Legislature and without the consent of the governor.

The SPEAKER. The time for debate has expired. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. STRAIT,] which is to suspend the rules, discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4705) which has been read, and to pass the same.

Mr. MARTIN and Mr. SPRINGER called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 61, nays 138, not voting 92; as follows:

So the rules were not suspended.

The following pairs were announced:

Mr. CORNELL with Mr. BLACK.

Mr. HAMMOND, of New York, with Mr. PHELPS.

Mr. VANCE with Mr. HUBBS.

Mr. RUSSELL with Mr. CARLISLE.

Mr. MCCOOK with Mr. SPARKS.

Mr. LADD with Mr. JOYCE.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts, with Mr. ELLIS.

Mr. ROSECRANS with Mr. FISHER.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER with Mr. MOULTON.

Mr. KASSON with Mr. BLOUNT.

Mr. JONES, of New Jersey, with Mr. COX, of New York.

Mr. BRAGG with Mr. POUND.

Mr. MCCOID with Mr. BARBOUR.

Mr. RYAN with Mr. LE FEVRE.

Mr. DE MOTTE with Mr. MATSON.

Mr. PARKER with Mr. SIMONTON.

Mr. HUBBELL with Mr. BELMONT.

Mr. SPRINGER with Mr. FARWELL of Illinois, on this vote; if Mr. FARWELL were present, Mr. SPRINGER would vote "no."

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. PEIRCE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. No. 3208) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, and for the armament thereof, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes."

VISITORS TO WEST POINT ACADEMY.

The SPEAKER, under authority and direction of section 1327 of the Revised Statutes, announced the appointment of the following members of the House of Representatives to attend the next annual examination of cadets at the Military Academy at West Point: Mr. CAMP of New York, Mr. DAVIS of Illinois, and Mr. BLACKBURN of Kentucky.

VISITORS TO NAVAL ACADEMY.

The SPEAKER also announced, under the authority and direction of chapter 68 of the supplement to the Revised Statutes of the United States, the appointment of the following members of the House of Representatives to attend the next examination of the Naval Academy at Annapolis: Mr. THOMAS of Illinois, Mr. DARRALL of Louisiana, and Mr. HARRIS of New Jersey.

PURCHASERS OF PATENTED ARTICLES.

Mr. CASWELL. I am instructed by the Committee on Patents to move to suspend the rules so as to take from the House Calendar and pass at this time a bill for the relief of innocent purchasers of patented articles. I ask that the substitute bill reported by the Committee on Patents be now passed.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the substitute bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. No. 6018) to amend section 4919 of the Revised Statutes, relating to the recovery of damages for the infringement of patents.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That no action for damages or proceeding in equity shall be sustained, nor shall the party be held liable under sections 4919 or 4921 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, for the use of any patented article or device, when it shall appear on the trial that the defendant in such action or proceeding purchased said article for a valuable consideration in the open market.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I call for a second on the motion to suspend the rules. I have no objection to having the motion considered as seconded.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the motion to suspend the rules will be regarded as seconded. The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. CASWELL] is recognized to control the time in support of his motion. The gentleman from Massachusetts is understood as opposing the motion, and will control the time in opposition.

Mr. SPRINGER. As there was considerable confusion in the House while the bill was being read I ask that it now be read again.

The SPEAKER. It cannot be read except in time allowed for debate. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. CASWELL] desire to be heard?

Mr. CASWELL. I will at present allow the floor to be occupied by the other side. If there are objections to the passage of this bill I would like to hear them.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized in opposition to the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. CASWELL. I will reserve my time.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, there is always some embarrassment in being asked to oppose a proposition before the grounds in favor of it have been stated, though that may be the practice in this case.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. CASWELL] has the right to reserve his time.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. Perhaps I can reserve mine, too.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman does so the Chair will put the question.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I have no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that under the operation of the existing patent laws there are difficulties that should be remedied, but the attempt to remedy them should be made with a great deal of care. Under the Constitution patentees have the right to the protection of their property in their inventions, and Congress should not carelessly or ruthlessly lay hold upon that property, which in many cases is very valuable. I understand that the call for this legislation arises from the difficulties which certain persons in the country have experienced because of the drive-well patent or the barbed fence patent, or something of that kind. This has been the argument urged heretofore in favor of a bill of this kind. I have no doubt at all that some measure of legislation may properly be adopted for the purpose indicated; but does not this bill go too far?

It is well known, I suppose, to every gentleman here that many patentees in this country who have spent their time, their energies, and their inventive genius in developing some invention are confronted not by farmers, not by innocent purchasers, but by great corporations that attempt to fight down the inventor and rob him of all the benefits of his invention. Suppose that a great railroad corporation, any one you please, is disposed to combat an invention. It may be an exceedingly valuable invention; it may be something promoting the protection of the lives of passengers on railways. The railroad company may want to use this invention, but may not want to pay the patentee for it. It is willing to "grab" the invention. It takes possession of it under some pretense or other, and fights the patentee during the life-time of his patent; so that he is obliged to come to Congress praying for an extension.

Now, this bill, under the guise of protecting the farmer (whom I will vote to protect at any time) or the innocent purchaser, protects others who ought not to have any protection, but against whom the whole power of this Congress ought to be invoked in aid of the inventor who may have put the energies of his life and all the means of himself and family into the invention that he has made. This bill undertakes to protect those parties who, it is said, have bought inventions in open market for a valuable consideration. But what remedy is afforded to the patentee? He is turned back to the person who sold the instrument or machine, and is deprived of redress against the party using it; and the seller is ordinarily, perhaps wholly, worthless—is an irresponsible person from whom no damages can be recovered. Thus you relieve from reliability the man who ought to be responsible and who ought to pay the damages. I hope that no such bill as this will pass in this moment of hurry.

I yield one minute to my colleague, [Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts.]

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I desire to suggest to members of the House what confusion would grow out of the operations of this bill. There are machines the product of which in a single year would be a fortune to any man. Under this bill the man buying one of these machines in open market, for a valuable consideration, has an advantage over everybody else who may use similar machines. He cannot be interfered with, his use of the machine cannot be stopped, he cannot be made to pay damages, while everybody else may be held to liability for unauthorized use of the invention. Hence the result of this bill would be injustice and confusion in all the mechanical and industrial branches of business. Certainly the gentleman from Wisconsin does not wish to tear up, root and branch, the entire patent law of the country, as he surely would do by the adoption of this bill.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I suppose it would be fair if I should now reserve some of my time, while the debate upon the other side goes on. I make that proposition. How much time have I?

The SPEAKER. Eight minutes.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I would like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts a question.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I will hear it.

Mr. HUTCHINS. Will not the effect of this bill be to allow the purchaser in open market to use the instrument which he has purchased, even after he has been notified that it is an infringement?

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. Undoubtedly.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. No proceeding can be had against it.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. Undoubtedly no proceeding can be had against it.

Mr. HUTCHINS. It not only relieves him from damages, but allows him to use it ever after.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. To go on and perpetrate the iniquity after he has been notified.

Mr. HUTCHINS. Is not that a nullification of the patent laws?

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. Undoubtedly it is.

Mr. HUTCHINS. He might know it when he bought it, and know it all the time he is using it, and you could not stop him.

Mr. MILLS. It is not the guilty purchaser, as I understand it, who is intended to be relieved by this bill. It is imperfect and should be corrected.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I should like now to hear from the other side, reserving what remains of my time.

Mr. CASWELL. Mr. Speaker, I am exceedingly anxious that this bill should not be misunderstood, for I feel very clear if it is understood there will be more than two-thirds of this House in its favor.

The Committee on Patents have given this subject a long and thoughtful consideration and have brought this bill in after consultation with the Committee on Patents.

In the first place, I desire to call attention to an error in the print of the bill. It occurs in substituting the word "unless" for the word "when" in the seventh line. It should read:

That no action for damages or proceeding in equity shall be sustained, nor shall the party be held liable under sections 4919 or 4921 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, for the use of any patented article or device, when it shall appear on the trial that the defendant in such action or proceeding purchased said article for a valuable consideration in the open market.

Mr. RYAN. You now substitute "when" for "unless."

Mr. CASWELL. Yes; that is the substitute.

Mr. RYAN. Explain that fully, for it is misunderstood in the House.

Mr. CASWELL. I repeat there is an error in the print, and that the word "unless," in the third line from the bottom of the page, should be "when."

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. Is that word "unless" in the bill as you offered it?

Mr. CASWELL. No; it is an error in the print.

Mr. SPRINGER. It does not change the effect of the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I combatted it, of course, as you explained it.

Mr. CASWELL. While it may be possible it may impair to some extent the rights of patentees in their patents, it is also true that it will give relief to more than one hundred persons who have purchased a patented article in entire good faith and are innocently using it. Now, this does not apply to a purchaser unless he is using it, and extends only to those cases where the man has gone into open market, and in good faith, without notice, has purchased and is using the article.

Mr. JACOBS. Why not insert in the bill the words "in good faith."

Mr. CASWELL. There can be no objection to that amendment, but amendment cannot be made under a suspension of the rules.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is a growing feeling all through this country against the patent-law system, and it arises because of these very abuses. The time will come, unless something is done to protect a man who purchases an instrument in open market for his use without notice, when there will be an uprising, and they will overthrow the patent laws.

Here and there throughout the United States are men who purchase in entire good faith an instrument, and set it up and commence its use, and somebody will come along and bring an action, or threaten to bring an action, against the user, and he is obliged to discontinue its use. I say he should be allowed to use that instrument, notwithstanding he has been notified, after he has purchased it and commenced its use.

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CASWELL. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. SPRINGER. What is there in this bill to prevent an irresponsible person from selling the most valuable patent-right and giving a good title to it and allowing the purchaser to use it during the lifetime of the patent without any remedy on the part of the patentee against the purchaser?

Mr. CASWELL. I conceive abuses may arise——

Mr. SPRINGER. And that, too, either with or without notice.

Mr. CASWELL. As I have said, abuses may occur; but let me tell my friend from Illinois that it is a common practice throughout the country for a patentee, as soon as he has secured the monopoly, to slumber on it—to tie it up and prevent any other party using it or developing it. He will let the patent slumber until some enterprising man will commence the manufacture of the instrument.

Mr. SPRINGER. You are giving, then, a license to some one to sell it for him if he will not sell it himself?

Mr. CASWELL. I am going to protect the party in the purchase of the patented instrument the same as you would be protected if you purchased a note in good faith which may have been given without any consideration at all.

Now, sir, I insist there is an existing abuse all over the country on this subject. You may go into a manufacturing establishment and here is one part of an instrument that is patented and another part that is patented and when you make your purchase you have no means of knowing the extent of any man's right to manufacture that instrument and you make your purchase in good faith.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. This bill is in the interest of the users of the patents.

Mr. CASWELL. And further, this bill will not prevent the patentee from stopping the manufacture of the instrument. It will not prevent his stopping the party from purchasing it, nor from selling it after purchasing. It only prevents the recovery of damages against the party who has innocently purchased any patented instrument and is using it himself for his own purposes; and it allows him to continue it where he is an innocent purchaser.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield to me for a suggestion?

Mr. CASWELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. CANNON. I will suggest to the gentleman that he ask unanimous consent to insert in the bill an amendment:

After the word "article," in the ninth line, insert the words "in good faith and without notice."

Mr. VALENTINE. I hope that will be done.

Mr. CASWELL. I ask unanimous consent that this amendment may be inserted, inasmuch as there seems to be a very general desire around me to amend the bill in that way.

Mr. REED. That is not the way to pass a bill of this character.

Mr. SPRINGER. I object. I object to any modification for the reason that I desire a further amendment, protecting the rights of patentees, in certain cases——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman need not state his reason; objection is sufficient.

Mr. SPRINGER. I merely want to state the ground of my objection.

The SPEAKER. It is not debatable.

Mr. CANNON. Then if it cannot be modified we will pass it as it is, and let it be amended in the Senate.

Mr. KENNA. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KENNA. I desire to ask whether, before the vote has been taken, the gentleman from Wisconsin has the right to modify the bill?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin is understood to be making a motion in pursuance of the power conferred upon him by the committee having charge of this matter. Having made the motion he has exhausted that power, and it will require unanimous consent to change it.

Mr. PEELLE. The bill now under consideration provides that no action for damages or proceeding in equity shall be sustained against any one for the use of a patented article, when such article was purchased for a valuable consideration in the open market. Sir, I am aware that this bill will give only partial relief, and I regret that objection has been made to amendments; but it will give some relief to that class of citizens who have in good faith purchased patented articles and then been compelled to answer in actions for infringement, and in many cases going from one to two hundred miles at an enormous expense. Sir, the expenses of attending court and attorneys' fees in most of this class of cases is more than is asked to settle the cases, and the consequence is that the people in most cases settle the alleged damages to avoid attorneys' fees and other necessary expenses incident to attending court.

Several bills have been introduced on this subject this Congress, and the committee have agreed upon the bill now under consideration, and because some relief can be afforded under this bill to innocent purchasers of patented article, I shall give it my support. In doing so I would not be understood as placing any barrier in the way of the inventive genius, for while I am in favor of protecting innocent purchasers in such cases, I am also in favor of protecting the patentee. This bill will most likely have a tendency to admonish patentees to be more careful in the disposition they make of their patented articles. I trust this bill will be perfected in the Senate, since objection has been made to amendments here by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RICE] to the end that all parties interested may be justly protected.

Mr. CASWELL. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Michigan. [Mr. BURROWS.]

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. I desire to yield two minutes of the time allowed me to the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. MILLS.]

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, under the Constitution and the laws the inventors have a monopoly of the articles they patent. Under the patent laws they have an exclusive monopoly for a certain period named in the law. But they ought not to be permitted to so use the monopoly thus granted to them as to afford a means of direct injury to the great body of the people of the United States, and they are so authorized by existing law. I have heard complaints in my district by my own people calling my attention to the number of mischiefs this bill is intended to remedy. It has been frequently stated that parties who have these monopolies granted to them under this law permit some one to infringe upon them and manufacture that which they have the exclusive right under their patent to produce, and they never claim the benefit of the protection allowed by the law for their right until the innocent holder purchases and begins to use it for his own benefit, and then you find their agents coming to him and demanding that he shall pay an exorbitant price for infringing or they will take him some two or three hundred miles to some Federal court to try the case against him.

This bill is intended to give to the innocent user or purchaser of the patented article the same right that an equity court gives to the holder of land who has paid in good faith for his title. The bill has been changed since it came before the House by striking out the word "unless" and inserting the word "when," so that the purchaser who buys in open market for valuable consideration has the same protection and all the protection that the law can give him.

Mr. CASWELL. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CASWELL. Would it be in order now to modify the original motion and move that the bill be taken up for consideration?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has no control of the bill now after the motion has been submitted from the committee except such as may be obtained from the House by unanimous consent; and the Chair understands that objection has been made to any modification.

Mr. SPRINGER. I do not insist on the objection.

Mr. CASWELL. I ask uanimous consent that the motion may be so modified as to take it up for present consideration with a view to amending it.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I have no objection as far as I am concerned.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that could not be done now.

Mr. SPRINGER. I withdraw my objection to the modification of the bill, as suggested by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The SPEAKER. Is there further objection to the modification of the bill by the insertion of the words suggested by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CANNON,] the gentleman from Illinois having withdrawn the objection?

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I renew the objection.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, the brief time allowed for debate upon this motion to suspend the rules and pass this bill is wholly inadequate to permit a recital of the outrages which this measure is intended to remedy much less to reply to the numerous criticisms urged against it. This is the second effort to bring this matter to the deliberate consideration of this House, and it is a little remarkable that, whenever it is sought to give protection to the innocent purchasers and users of patented articles, there are always some gentlemen to be found prolific of objections, to prevent, if possible, the passage of any measure for relief. Another peculiarity is, that these same gentlemen have no suggestions to make by which their objections may be overcome. They simply abound in criticisms.

Even now, when certain modifications are proposed by the friends of the measure, to avoid antagonisms and make it conform if possible to the views of its opponents, even this is objected to, and the conclusion is forced upon us that it is the purpose to prevent if possible all legislation whatever upon this subject. Now, sir, what I desire, what the people of the State which I have the honor in part to represent demand, what the farmers of this whole country insist upon, is that the purchasers of a patented article in good faith for a full consideration and in the open market shall be protected from the bands of patent-right inquisitors which infest the country and plunder our people. I demand for the purchaser in good faith of the barbed-wire fence, the drive-well, the Birdsell clover-huller, and the hundred other articles necessary to the farmers of the great West, that they shall be exempt from the unjust persecutions to which they are now subjected. I ask to embody in my remarks some well authenticated instances of outrages to which the people of my district and State have been subjected:

S. L. Bently, of Eaton Rapids, reported that on the Birdsell clover huller the following persons in that vicinity paid royalty on a huller valued at $450:

W. S. Smith, W. H. Ford, J. Horner, Delos Smith, and James Borabeck—the fee demanded and paid being $100 by each.

On circular-saw guide, valued at $50, $50 was demanded of R. Perrin, and $45 was paid. From H. Griffith and J. M. Allyn the same amount was demanded and the same paid. From Fred Spicer $50 was demanded and the case litigated, and a judgment of $91.50 rendered with costs.

For circular-saw dogs with attachments, valued at $75, from Fred Spicer $50 was demanded and $40 paid. The same demand was made of J. M. Allyn and H. Griffith for the same device, and same payment made.

W. A. Luman, of Elsie, writes that on a Glen & Hall clover-thrasher, valued at $260 when new, nine years after purchase a royalty of $125 was demanded, which, with the expense of two hundred miles travel and attorney fee, he paid. He also reports that from W. H. Davidson, for a Wooster huller valued at $280, a royalty of $125 was demanded and judgment obtained.

George Davidson had the same experience. J. Buesenger, A. E. Rockold, M. S. Hamilton, and E. Thompson each paid the $125 royalty demanded for using a Glen & Hall clover-huller.

R. B. Davis, of Fowlerville, reports that from Oscar D. Weller, on a clover-huller valued at $400, a royalty of $100 was demanded and paid. From J. R. Dait & Co. for use of head-block valued at $125, a royalty of $100 was demanded. It remains unsettled.

David Connell reports that Jeremiah Ramsey, of Monterey, used a cider-strainer made by himself, on which he paid a royalty to one J. D. Hampton, of Detroit, of $20.

Henry Hawley, of Burr Oak, reports that, from William W. Teal, for using several cider-press racks, valued at $12, that to his certain knowledge had been in use thirty years, one dollar for each ten was paid as royalty to avoid litigation. A much larger sum was demanded.

J. M. Failing, of Tekonsha, got an old Birdsell huller in a trade, calling it worth $100; never run it an hour; was sued for infringement, and refusing to pay the royalty of $100 demanded, learned at a cost of $417 that the United States district court for the eastern district of Michigan knew more of the value of a patent than he did, and we came very near adding the disrespectful remark—less of equity.

Jacob Willett, of Ingham County, was made to pay a royalty of $200 on the guide and arbor of a saw bought five years before, and valued at $75. Isaac S. P. Pound paid John C. Birdsell $100 for infringement of patent on clover-huller bought by him in 1871.

From Henry Kline, of Nottawa, $100 royalty was demanded and paid on account of use of clover-huller.

From Joseph Dean, of Colon, for clover-huller, a royalty of $100 was demanded and $50 paid.

The case of Mr. Dean was one of peculiar hardship. After using the machine long enough to earn $40, his arm was caught in the machinery and he was crippled for life. Selling the machine afterward, the purchaser was sued for royalty, and at the end of a suit found that his education in patent law had cost him $500. In behalf of Mr. Birdsell or his agent it should not be forgotten that on account of the poverty and crippled condition of Mr. Dean his liability was discounted 50 per cent.

We have summarized the reports we have received, and only ask in conclusion shall owners and users of patented articles always remain the victims of these unrighteous patent laws that have so long protected by the aid of the courts a class of rascals who find this a safer way to get something for nothing than the plan adopted by the road agent of Colorado?

These are samples of the persecutions to which the farmers are subjected.

In some instances the vender and the owner of the patent seem to be in collusion. For instance, a set of men go through the country with wagon-loads of gates and dispose of them to the farmers, who pay a full consideration and have no knowledge that they are patented, and after they are set up and in daily use another set of men scour the country and notify the purchasers of these gates that the hinge or some other portion of it is patented and that they are the owners of such patent, and thereupon a demand is made for five, ten, or twenty dollars' damages for infringement, and if payment is refused suit is threatened in the United States court. To avoid this they frequently submit to outrageous exaction; and so, under threat of judicial inquisition, our people are being plundered without stint or mercy. I hope this measure will receive the prompt approval of this House, that the people who purchase patented articles in the open market in good faith and for a full consideration shall not be hunted down by these insatiate vampires. [Great applause.]

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I have not any time to talk about what was said by the gentleman from Michigan in regard to objections coming from a certain quarter. I do not make my objection from any such spirit or for any such purpose. I do make it in the interest of right and proper methods of legislation.

The Constitution secures to the inventors the exclusive right to their discoveries; and I suppose that this Congress ought to hesitate a little while before it takes away from them the right of property vested in them by the Constitution.

I want to say this is a crude measure, which ought not to be here under a proposition to suspend the rules and pass it in a hurry with no opportunity afforded for its proper consideration. Let a day be fixed for the consideration of this proposition, and while I represent a great many who are patentees and inventors, I will join with those who support this measure in providing some legislation that will prevent the mischiefs which have been alluded to. But that cannot be done here in the way now proposed. Because somebody drives over the country with a wagon-load of gates we must have this clamor for legislation. Does not the gentleman from Michigan know there are frauds committed all along the line in every walk of life? And is he going to legislate against those supposed frauds in that atmosphere and under that stimulus and spur for consideration?

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I have not the time.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. I think it would correct an error into which the gentleman has fallen.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. You may correct it in your speech which you have obtained leave to print in the RECORD.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. I wish to meet the charge now that this is "crude" legislation.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I have not time to yield to the gentleman. What is "open market?" Does anybody know what "open market" means in this connection? Is it the "open market" if a man goes along with a wagon-load of gates and sells them? I think that is not "open market;" and if not, then the bill does not do what gentlemen want, and will be found practically a failure.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. It partially accomplishes what we want.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. It accomplishes nothing except to manifest an imprudent and hasty desire to do what should not be done in this way.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts has three minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. REED.]

Mr. REED. I am sorry I had any disposition to talk upon this subject, simply because three minutes are not adequate. Consequently I have to put what I have to say in compact shape.

I believe there are grounds for complaint; and any well-considered bill which protects the rights of all parties concerned I will vote for and support most heartily. But I want to say this business of protecting the property of inventors is double-sided. The Constitution has a right motive in protecting those men, because the public get value received, and unless you pay the inventors men will not invent. If you rob them of the proceeds of their invention after they have invented, you stop the business. And every man knows that notwithstanding the thousands of dollars that are taken away from innocent men by fraudulent practices such as are complained of, there are millions of dollars conferred upon the public by this very inventive faculty. Your bill does not protect the people you want to protect. It will enable railroad companies already banded together into associations against patents to absorb the brains of others without recompense. For one dollar you save farmers you will put thousands into the coffers of corporations.

If your bill means anything it means that you are to repeal the patent laws; and I say you cannot afford to do that. In order to meet a grievance, though a real one, you cannot afford to deprive yourselves of the entire benefit of the patent laws. If you pass this bill and if it accomplishes anything it is practically saying to inventors, "If you go on inventing you are going to have the proceeds of your inventions taken away from you."

Now, gentlemen, let us not in a moment of passion, arising perhaps from real grievances, do a wrong to this country to which the wrongs individuals are suffering from are but small in comparison. It is because inventors furnish a quid pro quo, it is because it is for the interest of this entire country to encourage invention, that the patent laws exist, and if you strip a man of his reward for his invention you strip him of all incentive to exertion. What would this country be without the inventive faculty? Without the patent laws to-day it would be poor instead of being rich. We owe the cheapness of everything that enters into the production of our daily bread, of everything that we wear, of everything that we use, to the inventive power. Do not strike it down. It is not wise to do so. Let a well-considered bill be presented, doing what you mean to do, and it will pass both Houses. Such a bill as this will die between here and the Senate, or if it passes inflict the injuries you do not intend.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I would ask if any portion remains of the time allowed for debate?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts has one minute of his time remaining.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I yield it to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT.]

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] said when this bill came up somebody always objected. I objected on the occasion of the last attempt that was made to obtain unanimous consent. I went immediately afterward to the gentleman from Michigan and offered to sit down with him and try to perfect a proper bill to cure what are undoubtedly existing grievances. The gentleman will bear witness to that fact. Subsequently I took him the documents which pertained to this matter, and I am surprised he should say in this House that some one objects without reason or any desire to perfect proper legislation. The bill now under consideration is confiscation, not legislation.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. Will the gentleman from New York allow me——

The SPEAKER. The time allowed for debate has expired. The gentleman from Ohio will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Would it be in order to move to recommit this bill to the Committee on Patents, with instructions to so amend it as to confine the operation of its provisions to innocent purchasers of patented articles and to individuals?

The SPEAKER. That would not now be in order.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. I ask unanimous consent, in view of some statements which have been made, that the letter of the Commissioner of Patents be read, which was written after an examination of this bill.

Mr. RANDALL. I suggest that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. CASWELL] permit the bill to be open for consideration and amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has not that power.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. I ask unanimous consent that the letter of the Commissioner of Patents be read.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I object.

The question was taken upon the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill, and upon a viva voce vote the Speaker announced that two-thirds appeared to have voted in the affirmative.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 155, nays 49, not voting 87; as follows:

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. PEIRCE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. No. 4466) making appropriations for the Agricultural Department of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes.

FRANK L. DONNELLY.

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. I am instructed by the Committee on Claims to move to suspend the rules so as to discharge the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar from the further consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 145) to pay Frank L. Donnelly as page to the Forty-fifth Congress, and to pass the same at this time.

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution will be read.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, &c., That Frank L. Donnelly, for services as page of the extra session and regular session of the Forty-fifth Congress, be paid, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, $92.50, balance earned by him and not yet paid.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the joint resolution was passed.

MRS. SALLIE CARROLL.

Mr. JADWIN. I am instructed by the Committee on War Claims to move to suspend the rules so as to discharge the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 5811) for the relief of Mrs. Sallie Carroll, executrix, and to pass the same at this time.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Mrs. Sallie Carroll, executrix and devisee of William T. Carroll, deceased, the sum of $20,000, being the value of timber and wood taken from the tracts of land known as "Sligo" and the "Dobbin" farm, and used in the construction of Fort Slocum and adjacent batteries by the military authorities of the United States.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask that a second be considered as ordered on the motion to suspend the rules, so that there may be some explanation given of this bill.

There was no objection, and the second was ordered.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask that the report from the Committee on War Claims be read.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read in the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2380) for the relief of Mrs. Sallie Carroll, executrix and devisee of William T. Carroll, deceased, report as follows:

The object of this bill is to indemnify the loyal owner for timber taken and used by the military authorities of the United States in the construction of some of the fortifications north of Washington and for other military purposes.

Mrs. Sallie Carroll is the executrix and sole devisee of William T. Carroll, deceased, who was for many years the clerk of the Supreme Court of the United States, and who died in the city of Washington on the 11th day of July, 1863.

He was conspicuously loyal to the Government of the United States, as was his widow; and some of the members of his family rendered important and distinguished military service to the Government during the rebellion.

The Carroll estate consisted in part of two tracts of land in Montgomery County, Maryland, called respectively "Sligo" and the "Dobbin" tract or farm. "Sligo" contained about one hundred and forty-eight acres, and "Dobbin" farm about three hundred and twenty-seven acres.

In the years 1862 and 1863 the chief engineer of the defenses of Washington, General Barnard, directed that all the timber on these tracts should be cut down, in order to obtain material for the construction of forts, fortifications, &c., and in order to clear the field of fire from the forts to be constructed.

In the erection of Fort Slocum and adjacent batteries, which constituted a portion of the defenses of Washington on the north, 130,000 cubic feet of hard timber, taken from the "Sligo" tract, was used under the orders of the officers of engineers engaged in the construction of the fortifications around Washington.

The timber used for this purpose was hard timber, oak and chestnut, and of large size. In addition, 2,000 cords of wood cut from the same tract was used for the construction of abatis.

Estimating the logs used in the construction of the forts to be worth ten cents per cubic foot, and the wood used for other purposes as worth $3.50 per cord, the amount justly due from the United States and payable for the property thus taken:

For 130,000 cubic feet of timber, at 10 cts	$13,000
For 2,000 cords of wood, at $3.50	7,000
Total	20,000

The taking of this timber for military purposes and its use in the construction of Fort Slocum and adjacent batteries and for abatis are stated with great minuteness in the affidavit of Mr. John Collins, under whose direct superintendence the work was done and who was a thoroughly competent, reliable, and truthful man, as is shown by the affidavits of Mr. Gunnell, the assistant engineer in charge.

By the same affidavits the value of the timber and cord-wood are shown and are the same as adopted in this report.

Upon these facts it appears to the committee that it is the plain and indisputable duty of Congress to pay this claim.

Provision has heretofore been made to pay all loyal citizens of the States lately in rebellion the value of their property taken and used as stores and supplies for the benefit of the military forces of the United States. No action has been taken by any department of the Government on the claim for wood used in the construction of fortifications. The provisions of the act of July 4, 1864, do not apply.

Colonel Barton S. Alexander, United States Engineer Corps, in a letter to the Chief of Engineers, dated Washington, District of Columbia, April 10, 1874, says: "In my judgment the sum of $250,000, if properly distributed, will be a fair compensation for all damages done to property of loyal owners by the Engineer Department in the construction and maintenance of the fortifications of Washington during the late civil war."

To deny to a loyal citizen of the District of Columbia any compensation for the loss of his property that was taken and used for the protection of the capital would, in the opinion of your committee, be a great injustice.

Your committee therefore report back a bill as a substitute for House bill No. 2586, and recommend its passage.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. JADWIN] desire to be heard in support of his motion? [A pause.] The Chair will understand the gentleman as reserving his time. Does any gentleman desire to be heard in opposition to the motion?

Mr. GEDDES. Mr. Speaker, I regard this measure as vicious in principle and exceedingly dangerous in practice. Although this claim has received the favorable consideration of a majority of the Committee on War Claims, bills of a similar character involving identically the same principle had previously been acted upon adversely by the same committee; so that it seems to me this case in all its features is now to be made exceptional.

The property taken in this case was material for the construction of temporary fortifications, thrown up merely for the time being. A portion of this timber was cut down simply for the purpose of giving the Army a better outlook in the active prosecution of the war, while actually engaged with the adversary. Other portions of this property were piled up in heaps, and these were called fortifications; but they were temporary in their nature and absolutely necessary at the time for purposes of defense. These acts must be regarded as done in self-defense. They can only be justified on the ground of overwhelming necessity for self-preservation. When such an emergency arises in the case of individuals or of a nation, and in the exercise of that right injuries are inflicted on friend or foe, individuals and nations alike are exonerated from all liability, legal or moral.

It was unfortunate that these claimants had property exposed to the ravages of war, and if such losses had occurred in only a few instances, or had been confined to a limited district of country, the General Government might safely waive its legal rights and generously grant compensation for this class of damages; but it must be borne in mind that our last war was the most extraordinary known to history. Unfortunately this led to the destruction of an immense amount of property as a wise, judicious, and just exercise of military authority.

The principle upon which this bill rests would involve the payment of hundreds of millions of dollars, claims for which are now pending before the War Claims Committee, of which I have the honor to be a member. Some of these we concede are full of merit; that is, they appeal strongly to the conscience, to the equitable consideration and judgment of men. But when we contemplate the magnitude of the war and the vast amounts of property that were necessarily destroyed, it is utterly impracticable to allow this class of claims.

Cases of this kind are not at all new. Various claims of this character have been acted upon from time to time, and in the earlier Congresses subsequent to the war some of these claims were passed. The claim of Dr. Best, of Tennessee, was one of a character appealing very strongly to a man's sense of right, and if that case stood alone I am not prepared to say that I would object to seeing compensation voted to the claimant. He owned a brick house which he was occupying and which stood in the way of the Army, so that they could not have a proper view of the enemy. The enemy used this house temporarily as a means of protection. The commanding officer of the United States forces ordered the house torn down, razed to the earth, in order that the battle might be carried forward. Dr. Best has been for years appealing to Congress for compensation, but this same committee has refused favorable action upon his claim, and our report to that effect is now on the table.

There was another case, the case of Thomas B. Wallace, a citizen of Lexington, Missouri, a loyal man doing all he could for the Government, who had his house torn down and destroyed by the Army in the active prosecution of the war. On behalf of the Committee on War Claims I submitted a report against granting relief in that case, in view of the impracticability of admitting the principle involved.

As I have said, some of these claims have passed the House, and a few of them many years ago passed both the House and the Senate. President Grant vetoed them all. In his veto messages, which I have not at hand, he used arguments which ought to be satisfactory to the House against the allowance of claims of this class.

If the present bill should receive the favorable consideration of the House we open the door to the payment of hundreds of millions of dollars for property thus taken as a matter of necessity in connection with the operations of the Army. A dangerous and deadly conflict of arms was being waged, involving the existence of the nation, and in such an emergency this property was destroyed. Thousands of this class of sufferers exist, and it would absolutely bankrupt the Treasury to pay them.

Mr. CANNON. I would be glad if the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GEDDES] would yield me a couple of minutes.

Mr. GEDDES. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. CANNON. I am.

Mr. GEDDES. Then I yield to the gentleman two minutes.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I only wish to say that in my judgment we cannot under a suspension of the rules, with fifteen minutes' discussion on each side, embark safely upon the policy of paying for every cord of wood or every stick of timber belonging to a loyal man that was destroyed during the late war by reason of the operations of the Army.

I wish to say further that even if payment in this case should be made, I believe the amount of compensation here proposed is too large. It appears by the report that all the timber in this case was cut from one of two farms, namely, the Sligo farm, embracing one hundred and forty-eight acres; so that this payment would be at the rate of more than $135 an acre for timber alone. Now I suspect that this Sligo farm never was and is not now worth $135 an acre. But, however that may be, I do not care to discuss the question whether this appropriation is extravagant or not; I say that we cannot afford on thirty minutes' discussion to embark upon the policy here proposed, and for one I shall vote against the bill.

Mr. GEDDES. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.]

Mr. HOLMAN. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SMITH.]

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I was a member of the minority of the Committee on War Claims who made, at least verbally, an adverse report on this bill. The action of the minority in this case is in harmony with the rule which has been recognized by the accounting officers of the Government as well as by the courts in dealing with questions of this kind, the principle controlling these decisions having been declared by the supreme court of Pennsylvania as early as 1788, in the case of Respublica vs. Sparhawk, 1 Dallas, 383. That decision, based on well-settled principles of the law of nations, was delivered by Chief-Justice McKean, from whose language I read:

> It is a rule, however, that it is better to suffer a private mischief than a public inconvenience, and the rights of necessity form a part of our law. Of this principle there are many striking illustrations. If a road be out of repair, a passenger may lawfully go through a private inclosure. (2 Black. Com., 36.) So, if a man is assaulted, he may fly through another's close. (5 Bac. Abr., 173.) In time of war, bulwarks may be built on private ground. (Dyer, 8 Brooke, Trespass, 213; 5 Bac. Abr., 175.) And the reason assigned is particularly applicable to the present case, because it is for the public safety. (20 Vin. Abr., (trespass,) B., note a, section 4, folio 476.)

According to all the elementary writers on the law, damages done by the erection of forts, the seizure of timber, or material for barricades under pressure of military necessity, give no legal right to compensation. In harmony with this well-settled doctrine has been the action of all the committees who have had cognizance of questions of this kind since I have been in Congress. The Committee on War Claims, from the time it was constituted in the Forty-third Congress, has recognized this principle, and has utterly refused to favor claims for damages resulting from the erection of fortifications on private property.

Mr. HOLMAN. I regret that a bill of this importance, involving as I conceive an important principle, should be brought forward under circumstances so unfavorable to reasonable discussion. I can say but little in the few minutes which are left me further than to indorse what has been already so well said by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GEDDES.]

The House will remember that this claim is alleged to be for property taken and appropriated for the use of the Army, and as such would come under the provisions of the act of July 4, 1864, and in that event would be cognizable by the Quartermaster-General and the accounting officers of the Treasury. Under the provisions of that act and in that view this claim, with others of the same character, went before the Quartermaster-General, but as it was in fact one of that large body of claims for spoliation during the actual operations of the Army at the seat of war, it was considered and passed upon unfavorably by the Quartermaster-General, and, in common with other claims for trees cut down and used in military operations in the same section, amounting to some $250,000, it was disallowed by the Quartermaster-General. Such is my understanding. The important question the House must consider now is whether or not we will proceed to take up and allow the claims which have been unfavorably reported upon by the Quartermaster-General. If we do we will open up a vast field of claim legislation. I do not think the House can safely enter upon that field of legislation. Congress at one time, many years ago, entered upon the allowance of this class of claims and passed the bill referred to by my friend from Ohio [Mr. GEDDES] in favor of Doctor Best, of Tennessee, and this House passed the bill for the relief of Mr. Wallace, of Missouri.

These bills were based substantially on the same principle which underlies the pending bill. The claim of Mr. Wallace was a very strong one, for when he suffered by the spoliation of our Army he was actually in the public service. I might name many similar cases, but these were reconsidered, and we again face the question whether we will pay claims for spoliations committed by the Army, and property damaged or destroyed during the operations of the Army at the seat of war. For, sir, whatever may be said about the appropriation of timber for the building of forts, this claim is for forest trees cut down in military operations and used in part in the operations of the Army for temporary defense; at least such is my understanding of the testimony in support of this claim. The trees were cut down and in part used for a temporary purpose of the Army—for temporary defense in the field, and not with a view to the erection of a permanent fort. It was simply the destruction of forest trees by the Army at the seat of war for military purposes. Like instances of spoliation occurred over a vast region of country in which undoubtedly many loyal persons suffered. Now, sir, up to this time claims of this class have not been paid, and I think the House will establish a perilous precedent in the passage of this bill. I trust that it will not be passed.

Mr. MILLS. Has not this House at this very session refused to pass the Best bill, and once when it was passed was it not vetoed by the President?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly, the committee reported the Dr. Best bill adversely, and it also reported, I believe, adversely to the bill for the relief of Mr. Wallace, of the State of Missouri. The House itself has declared by an amendment to the bill transferring claims to the Court of Claims against the payment for damages to and destruction of property by the operations of the Army at the seat of war. But, sir, I especially object to the attempt to pass a bill so far-reaching in its result as a legislative precedent under a suspension of the rules and with only a brief half hour for debate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. JADWIN. I will yield for five minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. ROBERTSON.]

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, I regret very much on this occasion to be called upon to advocate a war claim, but as I happen to belong to the committee from which this bill comes, and to have fully investigated many claims of this character, and among them the one now pending, it may be proper that I should say a few words before the vote is taken. The committee when it came to consider these claims laid down certain rules by which they proposed to be governed in auditing and acting upon such matters. The principle was enunciated by that committee that it would compensate loyal citizens for property taken and used by the Army during the war. And in the investigation of this particular case I feel perfectly satisfied, from the testimony which was adduced, that it was established beyond doubt and beyond dispute that this material was taken by the United States Government for the purpose of erecting a permanent fort. The fortification which was erected stood there from the time of its erection until the end of the war.

Now, it would have been paid for if it had been classed as other material taken for the Quartermaster's Department. If it had been material the Quartermaster-General could have taken cognizance of, it would have long since been paid for and this claim never would have come before Congress; but it was not used by the Quartermaster-General's Department, but by the Engineer Department of the Army, and therefore, under the construction given by the Government officers, it could not be paid for without an act of Congress. [Mr. GEDDES rose.] The gentleman had his time and I cannot yield to any interruptions, as I have but a very few minutes.

Mr. Speaker, this is as clear a case as I ever saw before this committee. It is, in my opinion, just in all respects. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GEDDES] has raised a bugbear that it opens the door to the payment of millions of dollars of claims of the same class. We had before us the evidence of the Engineer Department, in which it appeared that $250,000 would cover the whole amount of all these claims.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is, at that place.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Yes, at that place, and that is a good place. I do not want any better evidence.

Now, the gentleman from Indiana, who is bitterly opposed, as he says, to all these claims, is on record in favor of this claim, for that gentleman brought in a report on a former occasion in favor of a claim of a similar character, coming from Nashville, Tennessee, where timber and other materials were taken to build a temporary fortification around that city. That claimant came to Congress, and Congress, after auditing the claim, allowed him $15,000. He claimed $25,000 or $30,000, but he took the money which was allowed, $15,000, under protest. He brought his claim forward again in another Congress; but the gentleman from Indiana, more liberal then than now—he might have been a copperhead then, but he is not so much of a copperhead now—that gentleman, I say, took up that claim, reaudited it, increased the amount $5,000; that is, he allowed the claimant $5,000 more than the previous Congress had given, and which it deemed was sufficient payment for the damage done or the property taken.

Mr. GEDDES. Does the gentleman want this to be understood as a "copperhead" claim?

Mr. ROBERTSON. No, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend from Louisiana will see that the claim he refers to is for lumber taken from a lumber yard, while this is for timber growing upon the land.

Mr. ROBERTSON. That does not matter at all. It is the same principle. I do not care what the property may be. The Government has no right to take the property of a private citizen for public uses without just compensation. Now, here were about 140 acres of timber land, all of the timber on which was cut down and used by the Government for military purposes; the very same thing, or the very same principle that is laid down in the report of the gentleman from Indiana, which I have not time to read, but which shows that he favored the same principle.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think if the gentleman will continue the reading he would find, perhaps, differently.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I can only speak of what I have seen in the report.

Mr. HOLMAN. It did not become a law, I believe.

Mr. ROBERTSON. It did become a law. It passed Congress.

Mr. HOLMAN. Not the report I made.

Mr. ROBERTSON. It passed Congress as far as the gentleman himself could secure its passage. He favored it; made a report upon it; and not only that, but he thought the amount should be increased, the original report being for only $15,000. But the gentleman from Indiana favored the principle of paying the claim to such an extent that he said, "No; we will add $5,000 more and make it $20,000," and here is the very report the gentleman himself made.

Mr. HOLMAN. But the gentleman must admit that the same "gentleman from Indiana" to whom he refers made a subsequent report adversely upon the claim.

Mr. ROBERTSON. That does not matter. Here is the principle admitted by the gentleman himself. The gentleman from Indiana indorsed that proposition, and it does not matter whether it was wood or timber, or anything else; the principle is the same.

Mr. HOLMAN. But the gentleman will have the fairness to say that I reported adversely afterward upon the case, after a more thorough examination.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Perhaps you did, but I have not come to that part of the report yet. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania——

Mr. HOOKER. Has all the time allowed for debate been exhausted?

The SPEAKER. Two minutes' time yet remains.

Mr. JADWIN. I yield the two minutes remaining to the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. HOOKER.]

Mr. HOOKER. Mr. Speaker, I have been desirous of obtaining the floor upon this bill; but the time allowed for debate has been almost entirely exhausted. Still, in the brief time that remains I wish to say a few words in response to the argument made by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GEDDES.] The argument of my usually fair-minded friend, it seems to me, will not commend itself to the careful judgment of the House upon this question. The gentleman opposes the payment of this claim on the ground that other claims which in his judgment were as just as this have been rejected by the Committee on War Claims, and therefore as a sequiter this claim should be rejected.

This claim seems to have been very fairly and carefully considered, and reported favorably by the Committee on War Claims. It is a claim made by a citizen who was unquestionably loyal to the Government, a citizen residing in the District of Columbia, for damages done to contiguous property during the war. The property was taken for the purpose of constructing a permanent fort, which fort was used as a fortification during the entire war. That property, stripped of its timber—and I fail to see the distinction made by my friend from Indiana, who attempts to draw a line between the justice of a claim for lumber stored in a lumber-yard and timber standing on the land—this land, stripped of the timber, is probably of little or no value, the timber standing upon it constituting its main value. The Government took possession of the property, and cut the timber down. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GEDDES] I think concedes the justice and propriety of the claim, and objects to this demand, as I have said, upon the ground that millions of dollars of a similar character of claims will be presented if this is allowed. Why, Mr. Speaker, the very report of the committee upon the subject shows that an opinion was expressed by the engineer officer who made the investigation, Colonel Barton S. Alexander, that $250,000 will pay all the claims of the loyal citizens of the District of Columbia and contiguous thereto.

Mr. CANNON. How about Kentucky?

Mr. HOOKER. The gentleman had better ask my friend from Indiana, who seems to have reported in favor of a claim of this character from that locality. He understands the subject better than I. But if private property of a citizen was taken by the Government and applied to the construction of a fort for the defense of the country, I say that every principle of justice demands that he should be paid.

The SPEAKER. The time allowed for debate is exhausted.

Mr. HOOKER. Has the entire time allowed under the rule been occupied?

The SPEAKER. A part of it was occupied in reading the report.

Mr. HOOKER. I think that is a very unfair construction of the rule.

The SPEAKER. The rule permits the reading of the report as a part of the time to be occupied by either side in the debate.

Mr. HOOKER. The report is as much public property as anything else connected with the subject.

The SPEAKER. The uniform construction of the rule has been that when the reading of the report is called for it is to be taken out of the time allowed for debate.

Mr. HOOKER. Then there would be no debate at all under that construction, if the reading of the report occupied all the time.

The SPEAKER. Unquestionably; but the right to have the report read by any gentleman in his time has not been denied, although of course the entire report need not be read unless both sides concur.

Mr. MAGINNIS. The reading of the report was demanded by the other side.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GEDDES. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 38, nays 140, not voting 113; as follows:

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed without amendment bills and a joint resolution of the House of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. No. 6179) directing the Secretary of State to take the necessary steps for the removal of the remains of the late General Kilpatrick, minister to Chili, from Chili to the State of New Jersey for interment;

A bill (H. R. No. 3542) for the relief of Charles F. Benjamin and Henry H. Smith; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 111) authorizing the withdrawal from the Department of State of a certificate of indebtedness in favor of Mifflin Kennedy and Richard King against the Republic of Mexico.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. No. 543) for the relief of the heirs of Thomas Toby, deceased.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House, by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House that the President had approved bills and a joint resolution of the House of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 2315) to provide for the appointment of a commission to investigate the question of a tariff;

An act (H. R. No. 3196) to authorize and direct the Secretary of War to change the name of Charles Alton Howard, a second lieutenant in the Ninth Regiment of Cavalry of the Army of the United States, on the register, rolls, and records of the Army, to Alton Henry Budlong; and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 204) making an appropriation for fuel, lights, water, &c., for the fiscal year 1882, and for other purposes.

LAND CLAIM IN NEW MEXICO.

The SPEAKER. The next committee in order is the Committee on Public Expenditures.

There was no motion made on behalf of the Committee on Public Expenditures.

The SPEAKER. The next committee in order is the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. HAZELTON. I am authorized by the Committee on Private Land Claims to move to suspend the rules and discharge the Committee of the Whole House from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3835) to confirm a certain land claim in the Territory of New Mexico and to pass the bill. I ask that the report be read.

The SPEAKER. The bill must first be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the private land claim in the Territory of New Mexico known as the Cañon de Chama grant, numbered 71 in the report of the surveyor-general of New Mexico dated December 17, 1872, recommending the same for confirmation, be, and the same is hereby, confirmed to the heirs and legal representatives of Francisco Salazar and those persons, their heirs or legal representatives, named in the juridical possession of said grant executed March 1, 1808: Provided, That this confirmation shall only be construed as a quitclaim or relinquishment of title on the part of the United States, and shall not affect the adverse rights of any person or persons to the land so confirmed, and shall not convey any interest in or any title to any deposits or veins of mineral or coal.

SEC. 2. That the Commissioner of the General Land Office be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to issue a patent upon the survey of said grant approved by the surveyor-general of New Mexico September 7, 1878, now on file in his office, upon the payment to the United States of the cost of said survey, as provided by law; but it is expressly provided that said Commissioner shall have the right to cause a new survey of said grant to be made, or the survey hereinbefore mentioned to be corrected in any particular, upon which to issue said patent.

SEC. 3. That the confirmation of this claim shall not confer any right or title to any gold, silver, or quicksilver mines or minerals unless the grant claimed effected the donation or sale of such mines or minerals to the grantees, nor unless such grantees have become otherwise entitled thereto in law or in equity; but all such mines and minerals shall remain the property of the United States, with the right of working the same, which fact shall be stated in any patents issued under this act. But nothing in this act shall authorize the working of any mines therein by any person except the confirmees or their assigns until Congress shall provide by law therefor.

Mr. SPRINGER. I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to considering the second as ordered? The Chair hears none.

Mr. SPRINGER. I am opposed to passing a bill of this kind under a suspension of the rules. It involves the right to a large tract of land. I am informed that 472,000 acres are involved in the bill which has just been read, and which proposes to confirm to the claimant by act of Congress the title to this vast tract of land.

Gentlemen know very well how all such cases are adjudicated before committees. The evidence is necessarily ex parte. They cannot have the process of courts to compel the attendance of witnesses and to examine and cross-examine them in open court. The evidence upon which the committee has reported may be all very clear, but who knows what is behind it? Who knows what would have been behind this evidence if the claim had been referred to a court where the United States could have been represented by the Attorney-General; where witnesses could have been compelled to testify in open court and the Government could have been protected by the right of cross-examination and the introduction of other witnesses? I know that many cases of this kind have passed Congress heretofore, and that vast tracts of land have been confirmed to private individuals by special acts of Congress; and I know that in many of these cases also great scandals have arisen, and complaints have been made there was not proper investigation of the rights of the Government in the premises. I make no charges in this case, because I know nothing against the validity of the title and I know nothing in favor of it except through the report of the committee.

I know that the honorable gentleman who has submitted the motion to suspend the rules and pass this bill, [Mr. HAZELTON,] and the committee instructing him to submit that motion, have perhaps examined the bill with all the care that they can give to it under the lights which they have before them; but that does not satisfy my mind. This is a case of great importance to the Government and to the people of the United States. It is a claim involving half a million dollars' worth of property. If this land is worth a dollar and a quarter an acre, the minimum price of public lands, then the claim involves more than half a million of dollars.

Now, to pass such a bill as this, under a suspension of the rules, without a full opportunity of examination and discussion, is contrary to all correct principles of legislation, and ought not to be done by this House. I hope that the motion to suspend the rules will be voted down, and that at some future time the bill may be called up on private bill day, when it can be properly investigated and considered in the ordinary course of legislation.

I will reserve the remainder of my time until I have heard the arguments in favor of this bill.

Mr. HAZELTON. I would rather the gentleman would use the remainder of his time now, if there is any one to whom he desires to yield.

Mr. SPRINGER. I want to hear the argument in favor of this bill before I occupy the remainder of my time.

Mr. HAZELTON. This is one of those claims that come to us in the nature of a Spanish grant to citizens of New Mexico, under the Guadalupe Hidalgo treaty. Under the law of 1854 it became the duty of the surveyor-general of New Mexico to examine and pass upon all claims of this class. If in his opinion any of them were worthy and valid it was his duty to forward them with his statement to the Secretary of the Interior, who, if satisfied upon examination they ought to be confirmed, referred them to Congress for its action.

Congress has confirmed a great many grants of this character, which have come up from New Mexico and from States along the Mexican border and other Territories. If there has ever been a claim that ought to be confirmed, so far as human judgment can determine the matter, either in the Committee on Private Land Claims or in this House, this is one of those claims.

It comes to us valid from the beginning down, so far as the records, papers, and findings of all the Departments show. The original grant was regular and legal in all respects. There has been a continued possession by the grantees and their heirs from the time the grant was first made down to this hour. They entered upon the land under juridical possession. The boundaries of the grant are natural boundaries and well defined; besides that, this very claim was adjudicated in a Mexican tribunal, and that tribunal found that the title to this grant was in Francisco Solazar and his associates, and this bill simply proposes to confirm the grant to his heirs and legal representatives. In addition to that it has been examined with great care by the Interior Department. We have here the approval of the late commissioner of the General Land Office, General Williamson; and also the approval of the surveyor-general of the Territory of New Mexico. In addition to that we also have the absolute and unqualified approval of Secretary Schurz as Secretary of the Interior. The records bear them and us out in this conclusion.

The whole claim stands out clear and valid, so far as it can be determined by any tribunal, by the examination of any officer or Department of the Government, and it is unanimously reported favorably by the Committee on Private Land Claims of this House. This bill reserves to the United States all the minerals that may be upon or within this grant, and simply relinquishes and confirms to the legal heirs and representatives of these grantees the land itself.

Mr. DWIGHT. On what theory are the minerals reserved to the United States?

Mr. HAZELTON. I suppose the gentleman from New York [Mr. DWIGHT] understands; I know that he does.

Mr. DWIGHT. If the minerals belong to the United States, why does not the land also belong to the Goverment?

Mr. HAZELTON. All these grants to individuals in the Territories coming from the Spanish Government and the Mexican Government were confirmed under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, and we agreed with the Mexican Government in that treaty that we would pass upon these claims, and whatever rights a Mexican citizen was entitled to under his old government we would give him under our Government. Now, there were a large number of these private land claims all through the Territory of New Mexico, (I am talking now about that Territory especially,) and under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo and the law of 1854, and under the construction given to that law by our late Commissioner of the General Land Office, Mr. John S. Wilson, we have been passing upon these claims through all these various tribunals established by law, and this claim now comes to the final confirmation or rejection by the Congress of the United States.

Under the Mexican law it was understood that while these grants of land passed to the individual for occupancy, for pasturage, and for general use, all the mines and minerals were reserved to the Government of Mexico; or, in case of Spanish grants, were reserved to the Crown. Therefore these parties take no more than they would under the Mexican Government, and in pursuance of the old Spanish policy all the minerals are reserved to the Government of the United States. This confirmation only relinquishes the land for pasturage, cultivation, &c.

Mr. REAGAN. I would inquire of the gentleman if it is his understanding that the United States Government is bound to confirm all these claims in Mexican territory?

Mr. HAZELTON. Not at all. All claims were passed upon under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo; and whatever valid rights there were, inchoate or otherwise, existing in Mexican citizens, they were entitled to have confirmed to them by the Government of the United States.

Mr. REAGAN. I simply wanted to inquire whether they were required to investigate perfect titles?

Mr. HAZELTON. I suppose they should investigate the title. It must be a title; it must be something under the treaty. But in this case we have the action of the Surveyor-General, the Commissioner of the Land Office, and the late Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Schurz. In addition, there are the records of a Spanish court in which this very question of title was adjudicated and a decree made that the title was in Salazar and his heirs, to whom this bill proposes to confirm the title.

A MEMBER. How many acres are there?

Mr. HAZELTON. Four hundred and seventy-two thousand acres.

Mr. ATHERTON. If this title is perfect, why is it necessary to invoke the power of Congress to complete the title? I ask this question for information simply.

Mr. HAZELTON. It is necessary under the law of 1854 and under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo; and it has been the practice of this Government. Since 1848 nobody has got any title in a land grant in New Mexico in any other way than by confirmation here. [Mr. ATHERTON rose.] I wish to reserve enough of my time to have the report read. If that can be understood I will hear the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. ATHERTON.]

Mr. ATHERTON. Do all these grants from the Mexican Government require to be confirmed by act of Congress in order to make them valid?

Mr. HAZELTON. They have been, so far as I know.

Mr. DWIGHT. What is the necessity for the Government confirming these titles?

Mr. HAZELTON. It is necessary under the law; it is a matter of treaty obligation, as sacred as any obligation that can be assumed. Have we the right to say here that we will not observe a treaty obligation between Mexico and our Government?

Mr. DWIGHT. Are these men in possession?

Mr. HAZELTON. They have been in continued possession, and under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo they are entitled to a recognition of their title by this Government. That is all we ask.

Mr. DWIGHT. If there should be any defect in the title, may not the parties come back upon the Government?

Mr. HAZELTON. No, sir; this is only a relinquishment, only a confirmation.

Mr. DWIGHT. But you provide that a patent shall be issued.

Mr. HAZELTON. Yes; when the Secretary of the Interior is satisfied that the survey is correct, the parties will be entitled under this bill to confirmation; and he will issue to them a patent.

Mr. CALKINS. In the nature of a quitclaim deed.

Mr. DWIGHT. Will not a patent in this case be like any other patent that the Government issues?

Mr. CALKINS. No; it will be founded upon the provisions of this bill.

Mr. HAZELTON. The patent will be issued just as this bill directs; it recites how and upon what conditions the patent shall issue. In this legislation we are simply carrying out a treaty obligation.

Mr. DWIGHT. These people are in possession, are they not?

Mr. HAZELTON. Certainly.

Mr. DWIGHT. And there are more than four hundred thousand acres of this land?

Mr. HAZELTON. Yes sir.

Mr. DWIGHT. Then is not this too important a measure to be passed under a suspension of the rules without full opportunity for discussion?

Mr. HAZELTON. No, sir. You have been discussing it; I have been discussing it. This is a question of less difficulty and requiring less investigation than many other claims which have been brought up and passed in as little time as we have here to-day. I will say to my friend from New York that here is the trouble: important as it is to the people of New Mexico that they should have their treaty rights secured, that they should have their titles settled, we can never reach a bill of this kind so long as the House refuses to consider the Private Calendar. Week after week we are denied the consideration of bills of this kind on private-bill day, and it is for this reason that I present this measure here now. The gentleman from New York, while he may be a good lawyer, while he may understand titles, and all that——

Mr. DWIGHT. I am no lawyer at all.

Mr. HAZELTON. You must understand that our Land Committee has investigated thoroughly this whole question in connection with the records. You must understand that the late Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Schurz, investigated and certified to the validity of this measure and its correctness. You must understand that the case has been examined at the Land Office as carefully as an attorney would make an abstract of title. How much more examination and consideration of a claim can be asked? Why should we delay longer to act upon this case?

Mr. DWIGHT. Why not set a day for the consideration of the bill, and give members a full opportunity to be heard?

Mr. HAZELTON. I would be willing to wager almost anything that the gentleman from New York would never look at the bill again if he had three months to do so. [Laughter.] The only effect of delay in this case is to impede legitimate legislation; that is all.

Mr. DWIGHT. Will the gentleman allow me a few words?

Mr. HAZELTON. These questions must not come out of my time.

The SPEAKER. It comes out of the gentleman's time.

Mr. HAZELTON. If you have anything to say why the report of the committee is incorrect, why this bill should not pass, anything specific, say it. I ask now that the report of the committee be read.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin decline to yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. HAZELTON. I do. I ask for the reading of the report of the committee and I ask my friend to listen to it.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 556) to confirm a certain land grant in the Territory of New Mexico, report as follows:

1. It appears from the evidence that has been submitted to the committee that the original grant by the Spanish Government, in 1806, to Francisco Salazar and his associates was regular and in all respects legal.

2. That the grant had definite and natural boundaries, and that the grantees were put in juridical possession according to law.

3. That the grantees and their descendants have been in the continual possession of said grant from 1806 until the present time.

4. That proceedings were commenced in 1828 by certain parties to contest the validity of this grant in a Mexican tribunal, and that in 1832 it was decided that this grant to Francisco Salazar and his associates was legal, and that the grantees were the rightful owners.

5. That at the last session of the Forty-sixth Congress the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred a bill for the confirmation of this grant, referred the whole matter to the Secretary of the Interior for information and for his opinion, to which the following reply was made, and that thereupon the committee made a report in which they unanimously recommended the passage of the bill:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., May 20, 1880.

SIR: On the 15th instant the honorable Secretary referred to this office, "for information and opinion," H. R. 6075, entitled "A bill to confirm a certain land claim in the Territory of New Mexico."

This bill, which was referred to you by direction of the Committee on Private Land Claims of the House of Representatives, provides for the confirmation of the grant known as Cañon de Chama, in Rio Arriba County, New Mexico, and in connection with the matter I have the honor to report as follows:

Under the eighth section of the act of July 22, 1854, (10 Stat., p. 308,) a petition was filed with the surveyor-general of New Mexico for the confirmation of the title to the Cañon de Chama tract, based upon a grant of the same said to have been made August 1, 1806, to Francisco Salazar and others, by Joaquin Alencaster, then governor of the province of New Mexico.

March 1, 1808, juridical possession was given by Manuel Garcia de la Mora, chief alcalde of the town of La Canada, the boundaries being described therein, according to translation, as follows: "On the north the Caballa Valley, on the south the Capulin, on the east the boundary of the Martinezes, and on the west the Little White Hill, (Segita Blanca.)"

The testimony taken in this case shows that this grant has always been settled and occupied by the claimants, except when driven off by the Indians.

The Surveyor-General, in his report of December 17, 1872, states that "the Spanish papers are certified copies of the originals made in 1832 by Pedro Ignacio Gallego at the request of José Pablo Salazar, the originals having been very much handled, [manido;] and their correctness is certified by Antonio Abad Duran, corporation secretary of Abiquiu, on the 4th of April, 1832." He concludes by approving the grant and recommending its confirmation by Congress.

A transcript of this report and of the accompanying title papers and testimony were transmitted by the honorable Secretary of the Interior to the President of the Senate February 14, 1873, and are printed in Senate Executive Document No. 45, Forty-second Congress, third session.

The surveyor-general of the Territory of New Mexico, whose duty it is under the law to examine and pass upon the validity of all private land claims in said Territory presented to him for adjudication, having reported in favor of the grant in question, I know of no objection to its confirmation by Congress.

It is proposed by the bill (H. R. No. 6075) to confirm the grant according to a survey approved by Surveyor-General Atkinson September 7, 1878. This survey is on file in this office, and appears to conform substantially to the boundary named in the juridical possession. It contains an area of 472,736.95 acres, being an average of about 12,275 acres to each claimant.

I inclose a draft of a bill, prepared in this office, which I would suggest as a substitute for the bill in question.

The bill is herewith transmitted; also a tracing of the survey referred to.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. A. WILLIAMSON,
Commissioner.

Hon. C. SCHURZ, Secretary of the Interior.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, May 22, 1880.

SIR: House bill No. 6075, to confirm a certain land claim (Cañon de Chama) in the Territory of New Mexico, was received from your committee and referred to the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

I have the honor to transmit herewith a copy of his report on the subject, under date of the 20th instant. He expresses the opinion that the claim should be confirmed, and in this opinion I concur.

Very respectfully,

C. SCHURZ, Secretary.

Hon. J. M. GUNTER,
Chairman Committee on Private Land Claims,
House of Representatives.

The present bill differs from the one introduced in the last Congress in this: it provides that all mineral and mining rights shall be excepted.

Your committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill herewith submitted as a substitute for House bill No. 556.

[The time having expired during the reading of the report, by unanimous consent it was ordered to be printed in the RECORD entire.]

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me the House is entitled to an opportunity to see the evidence on which this confirmation is to be made. It will be observed that so far as the bill and report and the remarks of the gentleman from Wisconsin are concerned it appears there has been no adjudication, except by the surveyor-general, I mean since the acquisition of that Territory by the United States; and that as far as we know may have been an ex parte hearing, just as it is doubtless true there has been an ex parte hearing before the committee, no witnesses summoned for the Government, no notice to adverse claimants if there be any. We have no statement whether there is or is not an adverse claimant. There is no reservation in behalf of adverse claimants. Here on an ex parte hearing to perfect an inchoate title we are asked to pass upon all the rights involved without hearing the evidence necessary in order to confirm or reject a title.

In the Louisiana claims the Government reserved the right to reject all inchoate titles, as it did in reference to the territory it acquired from Mexico.

I would understand if this were a perfect title, as indicated in the report and remarks of the gentleman from Wisconsin, it needed no confirmation, no adjudication, and would be held to be good in the courts of the country. As an inchoate title Congress passing on it, confirming the title, precludes all adverse claimants, whatever their equities may be. That is according to the decision of the courts.

We are not advised whether there are or not adverse claimants, and, as I have said, we make no reservation of the rights of adverse claimants.

Mr. NORCROSS. The bill does make that very reservation.

Mr. REAGAN. It does not.

Mr. HAZELTON. Put in any reservation of that kind you like, and I will accept it.

Mr. HOOKER. You cannot do it now.

Mr. REAGAN. I have during the course of my life had a good deal of observation in reference to this class of claims and their confirmation, and I feel that common prudence demands that this House should not pass on this claim on the showing before us; that there should be some evidence of title; that there should be some statement whether there are or not adverse claimants. We should have something from the Government, something more than the mere statement of the claimants themselves to act on.

I understand there is a bill before the House to create a commission to investigate claims of this character, and if there is such a bill and it should become a law, it would be a proper tribunal to which to refer this claim.

Mr. HAZELTON. I ask the gentleman in all fairness to read this letter of the Secretary.

Mr. REAGAN. I have read it. The Secretary of the Interior reports to Congress that the Commissioner of the General Land Office on an ex parte hearing recommends the confirmation of this claim.

Mr. HAZELTON. Let me read section 1 of the bill. It is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the private land claim in the Territory of New Mexico, known as the Cañon de Chama grant, numbered seventy-one in the report of the surveyor-general of New Mexico, dated December 17, 1872, recommending the same for confirmation, be, and the same is hereby, confirmed to the heirs and legal representatives of Francisco Salazar and those persons, their heirs or legal representatives, named in the judicial possession of said grant executed March 1, 1808: Provided, That this confirmation shall only be construed as a quitclaim or relinquishment of title on the part of the United States, and shall not affect the adverse rights of any person or persons to the land so confirmed, and shall not convey any interest in or any title to any deposits or veins of mineral or coal.

Mr. REAGAN. In a subsequent section it provides that the Commissioner shall issue a patent, and, as the gentleman knows, that precludes the possibility of other equities coming in to contest it.

Mr. HAZELTON. It provides it shall be issued in accordance with the provisions of this bill.

Mr. REAGAN. I know; but when the Government issues its patent for an inchoate title it precludes all equities against it. Nobody can set up an equity to go behind the title after the Government has issued its patent.

The truth is, when the Government confirms an inchoate title, though there may be adverse equities behind it, the adverse equities fall with the confirmation of the title. It is a passing of the title to this land by the Government completely; and the act of Congress granting the title would be a bar to the setting up of any claim on the part of any other person even though he might hold an older and better equitable but inchoate title than the grantees themselves. This is a matter that should receive more careful consideration; and

I do not care to say more than that it seems to me that a claim of this character should be considered maturely; and the House will hardly be true to itself and to the best interests of this country to confirm so large a title on such small evidence.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SPRINGER. I now yield the remaining time to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CONVERSE.]

The SPEAKER. The time allowed for debate has expired.

Mr. CONVERSE. I think there are three minutes of the time remaining.

The SPEAKER. There is no time for debate remaining.

Mr. SPRINGER. I do not understand that the time has all been occupied.

The SPEAKER. The entire time has been occupied.

Mr. DWIGHT. I want to ask consent of the House for a moment.

The SPEAKER. There can be no time allowed for debate except by unanimous consent.

Mr. DWIGHT. Then I ask unanimous consent as a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. DWIGHT. Mr. Speaker, during the course of the remarks of the gentleman from Wisconsin, I made some inquiries of him with reference to what seemed to me a very pertinent matter in connection with this question, that involves, as I understand it, something over four hundred thousand acres of land.

Mr. SPRINGER. Four hundred and seventy-two thousand acres.

Mr. DWIGHT. My friend from Texas gave some reasons for opposing the bill which it seems to me underlie the whole question. I was attempting to ask my friend from Wisconsin a question, and—as is usual at such a time, always under a disadvantage where gentlemen are indisposed to yield—I wanted to call the attention of the House to some things which my friend from Texas has stated, and I propounded questions to the gentleman from Wisconsin which I regarded as of sufficient importance to have elicited a reply, and which I believe my duty to the House and country demanded should be asked. The gentleman did not answer the questions in such manner as in my judgment the importance of this subject demands.

Mr. HAZELTON. I certainly had no intention of failing in that respect.

Mr. DWIGHT. I am satisfied that I was right in asking that the House should take the time to consider this matter more carefully or set apart at all events a day for its proper consideration, so that a question involving, as this does, millions of dollars might have that attention its importance demands. Four hundred and seventy-two thousand acres of land are involved in this bill, that may be worth ten millions of dollars—for aught I know fifty millions. The gentleman from Texas has stated that if this confirmation shall be made by Congress, notwithstanding what this law says, the United States will thereby have given a perfect title to every acre of that land. Does not everybody know who knows anything about such questions that if it shall turn out by and by that some person has suffered a loss by the act of the General Government giving perfect title to this land, that a claim will eventually come here on the part of somebody else like this presented by my friend and ask that it shall be allowed under a suspension of the rules?

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin to take from the Private Calendar and pass the bill which has been read.

The question was taken; and the Speaker decided by sound that two-thirds had voted in the affirmative.

Mr. SPRINGER. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HAZELTON. Let us have a division.

Mr. SPRINGER. No; I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 39, nays 126, not voting 126; as follows:

COLLECTION OF TAXES IN THE DISTRICT.

The SPEAKER. The next committee in order is the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. NEAL. I am instructed by the Committee on the District of Columbia to ask for a suspension of the rules to put on its passage the bill (H. R. No. 6095) to provide for the collection of taxes in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes. This is the bill as amended.

Mr. RANDALL. This would be a good point to adjourn at. That is a long bill. Will the gentleman from Ohio yield for a motion to adjourn?

Mr. NEAL. This bill has been read twice to a full House.

Mr. RANDALL. It will have to be read again.

Mr. NEAL. Not necessarily.

Mr. RANDALL. I think it will have to be read again.

Mr. NEAL. If the gentleman calls for the reading of the bill I withdraw it.

Mr. RANDALL. I do call for the reading of the bill.

Mr. NEAL. Then I withdraw it.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. COX, of New York. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. COX, of New York. I call for the yeas and nays.

The question being taken on ordering the yeas and nays there were—ayes 23.

The SPEAKER. In the judgment of the Chair, a sufficient number have not voted to order the yeas and nays.

Mr. RANDALL. Count the other side.

The negative vote being counted, there were—noes 91.

So (the affirmative being more than one-fifth of the whole vote) the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 77, noes 96, not voting 118; as follows:

TONER COLLECTION OF BOOKS, ETC.

Mr. McCOOK. I am instructed by the Joint Committee on the Library to move to suspend the rules so as to pass the joint resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk. It is a joint resolution to accept the donation of some twenty or twenty-five thousand volumes of books, &c., from Dr. Toner, of this city. The committee have instructed me unanimously to introduce the resolution and move that the rules be suspended and the resolution passed.

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A joint resolution to authorize the Librarian of Congress to accept the library offered to be donated to the United States by Dr. Joseph Meredith Toner, of Washington, District of Columbia.

Resolved, &c., That whereas Joseph Meredith Toner, of the city of Washington, District of Columbia, has offered to donate to the United States for the use of the public, and for the promotion of literature and science, a large and valuable collection of books on medical science and historical and miscellaneous subjects, upon certain terms and conditions set forth by him in a memorial addressed to Congress, and which is in the following words:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

The memorial of Dr. Joseph Meredith Toner, city of Washington, District of Columbia, respectfully shows to your honorable bodies that he is the owner of a large and valuable collection of books and pamphlets, about twenty thousand volumes or upward in number, treating of medical, scientific, historical, biographical, literary, and miscellaneous subjects, and many of which are very rare and of great interest; and desiring that said collection of books, to the accumulation of which your memorialist has devoted considerable funds and a large part of his life, should be permanently preserved and placed where it would be most beneficial to the cause of science and most advantageous to the public, he respectfully offers said collection to the United States of America, to be placed in the National Library of the United States, at the city of Washington, under the management and control of the Librarian of Congress, upon the terms and conditions following, which he deems to be reasonable and just, and which he trusts will prove acceptable to your honorable bodies, namely:

First. That the collection should be kept separate and apart from the other books and pamphlets in the Library, in separate rooms or alcoves, and that it should be known and described as "the Toner collection."

Second. That the collection of books and pamphlets be bound, when requiring it, in a uniform and satisfactory manner, and have placed on the back of each a parchment band to distinguish them, and that a device distinctive of the donation be stamped on the title page of each, and that they be kept accessible for reference, and be catalogued as speedily as practicable; and when they appear by title in the printed catalogue of the Library, that some letter or symbol indicative of the collection be used, and that the condition and growth of the collection be made a matter of record in each annual report by the Librarian of Congress.

Third. That the collection be kept and used mainly for reference and be consulted subject to the rules governing the use of rare books, and be called upon for service only when no other copy of the book or pamphlet asked for is available, and not be taken out of the Library except for special reasons.

Fourth. That your memorialist should be permitted to make additions to the collection from time to time as he may desire, upon the same terms as herein specified, and that he have liberty to insure the perpetual increase of the collection by the establishment of a trust fund for the purpose.

Your memorialist, while desiring to perpetuate his name in connection with the donation which he here proposes to make, believes "the Toner collection" will prove useful and valuable to the country and will involve no unusual expense on the part of the United States.

Respectfully submitted,

J. M. TONER.

Now, therefore, the Librarian of Congress is hereby empowered and directed to receive and accept from the said Dr. Joseph Meredith Toner his collection of books and pamphlets aforesaid, and to place the same in the library in his charge under the terms and conditions set forth in the said memorial.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended, and the joint resolution (H. R. No. 211) was passed.

DISTRIBUTION OF OFFICIAL RECORDS OF THE REBELLION.

Mr. SPRINGER. I am instructed by the Joint Committee on Printing to report back the joint resolution (H. R. No. 150) and to move that the rules be suspended and the joint resolution passed at this time.

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there shall be republished 7,000 copies of the first, second, and third volumes of the Official Records, Union and Confederate, of the War of the Rebellion, authorized to be published by the "act making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1881, and for other purposes," approved June 16, 1880, to be distributed in the manner following, namely: 4,500 copies thereof shall be distributed by the Secretary of the Interior at the request of Representatives and Delegates in Congress of the Forty-seventh Congress. Each Representative and Delegate shall furnish the Secretary of the Interior with the names and addresses of fifteen public, college, or school libraries, or of individuals of his Congressional district or Territory, as the case may be, to which addresses shall be sent the said volumes one, two, and three; but one volume of each of which shall be sent to the address of the Representative or Delegate, unless otherwise ordered by him. The remaining 2,500 copies of volumes one, two, and three of said official records herein authorized to be republished shall be distributed as follows: 1,000 copies, or as many thereof as may be necessary, may be distributed by the Secretary of War among those persons who have contributed valuable documents, by gift or loan, to the records aforesaid; 1,000 copies for the use of the Interior Department for the supply of public, university, and college libraries; and 500 copies to be delivered to the Secretary of the Interior to be sold for cost of publication with 10 per cent. in addition thereto. The Public Printer shall furnish to the Secretary of the Interior a statement in writing of the amount to be charged for each volume of said records under this joint resolution; and the same may be sold in single volumes or by subscription for entire sets, each volume to be paid for on delivery.

SEC. 2. That the publication of the Official Records of the Rebellion after volume 3 shall be 10,000 copies, to be distributed by the Secretary of the Interior to the addresses furnished him by Representatives and Delegates in Congress, as provided in the first section of this resolution, namely, 4,500 copies; to the War Department for the use of the Executive Departments, 1,000 copies; to the War Department for the use of persons who have contributed valuable documents, by gift or loan, to the records aforesaid, 1,000 copies; to the Interior Department for the supply of public, university, and college libraries, 1,000 copies; to Senators in Congress, 2,000 copies; and for sale as provided in section 1 of this act, 500 copies.

Mr. RANDALL. I demand a second of the motion to suspend the rules.

There being no objection, the second was ordered.

Mr. SPRINGER. I send up the report of the Committee on Printing on this joint resolution, and ask that it be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred joint resolution (H. R. No. 150) "concerning the publication and distribution of the Official Records of the Rebellion," having had the same under consideration, submit the following report:

The act entitled "An act making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1881, and for other purposes," approved June 16, 1880, authorized the publication of 10,000 copies of the Official Records, Union and Confederate, of the War of the Rebellion, 7,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, 2,000 copies for the use of the Senate, and 1,000 copies for the use of the Executive Departments. This publication will not be completed for several years. Three volumes have already appeared, and the set when completed will number nearly 100 volumes. Under the present system of distribution it is next to impossible for complete sets to be placed in the same libraries, as a few volumes will be distributed by each Congress for several years. There was also no provision in the law authorizing the distribution of sets to public, university, and college libraries, as in other cases, and the Secretary of War finds the 1,000 copies placed at the disposal of the Executive Departments inadequate to the demand. There is also a demand made for the publication of certain volumes for sale. In reference to the necessity for a larger publication for the use of the Executive Departments, the Secretary of War has sent the following communication to the House:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, December 12, 1881.

SIR: Referring to such portion of the act of June 16, 1880, as provides for the publication and distribution of the Official Records of the War of the Rebellion, (21 Statutes, page 269,) I have the honor to invite the attention of the House of Representatives to the very limited and inadequate provision made for supplying these records to the several Executive Departments of the Government, there being only one thousand (1,000) copies of each volume allowed for all of the said Departments.

Of the number controlled by this Department under such distribution a large proportion is consumed in supplying a copy each to the libraries of the several military posts, the division and the department headquarters, and the various bureau offices; so that the general distribution by the Department of the volumes thus far printed has been attended with considerable embarrassment, the limited number at its disposal enabling it to furnish copies to but a comparatively few officers, being those only of high rank, thus necessarily omitting many officers to whom the work is of peculiar interest and who, it would seem, are eminently entitled thereto by reason of their rank and past service in the Army.

In consideration of these facts and in the belief that the subject is one which will commend itself to the favor of Congress, it is respectfully recommended that the existing law governing the distribution of these records be so amended as to allow an additional one thousand (1,000) copies of each volume (2,000 copies in all) to the Executive Departments of the Government.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

ROBERT T. LINCOLN,
Secretary of War.

The SPEAKER of the House of Representatives.

The Secretary of the Interior has sent the following letter to the chairman of the House Committee on Printing, requesting additional copies for the use of public, college, and university libraries:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, February 10, 1882.

SIR: I have the honor to invite attention to the fact that in the act of Congress ordering the publication and distribution of the Records of the War of the Rebellion no provision is made for the supply of public, university, and college libraries, except as these may be supplied from the number sent to the folding-rooms of the Capitol for the use of Senators and Representatives. I am informed that these volumes will not be included in the sets of Congressional documents which are supplied to State libraries and depositories of public documents through this Department. Of the 1,000 copies ordered for the use of the several Executive Departments, the allotment made by the honorable Secretary of War, under whose supervision they are distributed, is only 50 copies to this office.

Under these circumstances, and taking into consideration also the fact that the depositories of public documents in the Congressional districts of the several States, as well as a large number of other public, university, and college libraries, are accustomed to look to this Department for their supply of public documents, I have the honor to respectfully recommend that in ordering the republication of the volumes already issued, an edition of at least 1,000 copies be supplied to this Department, to enable it to furnish the institutions above named with this valuable publication, and that similar provision also be made in reference to the volumes which are yet to be printed.

Very respectfully,

S. J. KIRKWOOD, Secretary.

Hon. R. T. VAN HORN,
Chairman Committee on Printing, House of Representatives.

There has been referred to this committee a resolution submitted by Mr. KLOTZ, of Pennsylvania, authorizing the reprinting of 1,000 copies of volumes 1, 2, and 3 of the Official Records of the Rebellion, which should be sold at cost and 10 per cent. added.

In view of the requests for the publication of additional copies of this valuable work, and of the further fact that the manner of distribution through the members of the House, from time to time, which would result in breaking the sets and thus destroying their value, your committee recommend the passage of the accompanying joint resolution.

Mr. SPRINGER. If any gentleman does not understand this joint resolution I will explain it. It has been several times before the House and I think is quite well understood, and I am of the opinion that there can be no objection to its passage.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I will ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] if this joint resolution does not propose to altogether change the method of distributing these documents?

Mr. SPRINGER. It does, so far as the House is concerned; it does not interfere with the present method of distribution by the Senate.

This publication will run through four of five, perhaps ten years, and the number of volumes in a set will be ninety-six. The object of this joint resolution is to make provision for distributing this valuable work to public libraries where it should go. Under the law, as it now stands, it will be almost impossible for a complete set of this work to be placed in any public library.

Mr. RANDALL. How many sets of these books are authorized to be printed?

Mr. SPRINGER. About fourteen sets for each member of the House.

Mr. RANDALL. How many in the aggregate?

Mr. SPRINGER. Ten thousand.

Mr. RANDALL. Nearly a million books.

Mr. SPRINGER. The aggregate number is not changed by this resolution; that is already fixed by law.

Mr. MCMILLIN. What was the reason for adopting one rule of distribution as to members of the House and another rule as to members of the Senate?

Mr. SPRINGER. We did not desire to interfere with the distribution of the copies appropriated to the Senate. Senators being elected for six years, and in many cases re-elected, we thought it best to allow them to provide for the distribution in their own way. But members of the House, being elected for only two years, cannot properly distribute publications running through five or ten years, and embracing so large a number of volumes. These books should properly go to public libraries, and we seek by this resolution to have them so distributed.

Mr. PEELLE. I am in favor of this resolution and shall vote for it; but I wish to suggest to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] that as the fourth volume of this work is now out and has already been placed to the credit of members, he should ask unanimous consent to amend the resolution so as to include the fourth volume in the provision for reprinting.

Mr. SPRINGER. If I should find hereafter that the fourth volume is so far distributed as to make it impossible to include it in the distribution provided for by the resolution, I shall ask the Committee on Printing of the Senate to have the resolution amended. I hope, however, there will be no necessity for that.

Mr. PEELLE. I think there need be no trouble in arranging this matter now. I suggest to the gentleman that the resolution be amended by unanimous consent.

Mr. LACEY. I wish to ask what provision is made for the completion of sets, a portion of which has already been sent out?

Mr. SPRINGER. This resolution provides for the republication of a sufficient number of the volumes already distributed to make complete sets in the manner indicated by the resolution.

Mr. LACEY. What provision is made for furnishing future volumes to those who have already received the earlier volumes?

Mr. SPRINGER. The mode of distribution is changed by this resolution so that complete sets shall be furnished only in the manner specified.

Mr. LACEY. That applies to those who may be designated hereafter, but I am speaking of those who have received the volumes already distributed.

Mr. SPRINGER. The same persons may be designated to receive the subsequent volumes.

Mr. BINGHAM. Each member, as I understand, has been allowed twenty-three volumes of a set, four of which have already been distributed. Now, I desire to know whether the gentleman's proposition will prevent the completion of the sets in the hands of our constituents to whom volumes have already been distributed?

Mr. SPRINGER. Members may indicate the distribution of future volumes to the same libraries that have received previous ones.

Mr. BINGHAM. I am not speaking of libraries.

Mr. SPRINGER. Or individuals. But the committee are of the opinion that this book is not one suitable to be distributed to private individuals. It will embrace, when completed, nearly one hundred volumes. These volumes are records; and gentlemen will not desire that private individuals should have one hundred volumes of these records, which are useful only for reference.

Mr. BINGHAM. I do not think there is a district in the country that has twenty-three public libraries.

Mr. SPRINGER. Only fifteen sets for each member are provided by this resolution.

Mr. BINGHAM. Is there any district that has even fifteen public libraries?

Mr. SPRINGER. Individuals can be supplied, under the resolution, where a sufficient number of public libraries are not in existence.

Mr. AIKEN. Do I understand that this resolution takes the distribution out of the hands of members of the House?

Mr. SPRINGER. It puts the distribution in your hands; you indicate where the volumes shall all go.

Mr. AIKEN. Who sends them out?

Mr. SPRINGER. The Secretary of the Interior, under the direction of members. You give the addresses to the Secretary of the Interior and he sends out complete sets, the volumes continuing to be sent after you may have gone into private life. They will go to the libraries indicated until the sets are completed.

Mr. MARTIN. Does the gentleman think that we in this Congress can bind our successors?

Mr. SPRINGER. Congress undoubtedly may hereafter pass another law on this subject.

Mr. MARTIN. Then if the law should be repealed, this system of distribution will be broken up.

Mr. SPRINGER. Of course Congress can act on this subject hereafter, as it has done heretofore. We simply desire that this work shall go to public libraries, where it properly belongs.

Mr. MCCOOK. The original bill on this subject provided that 10,000 copies of the complete Records of the War of the Rebellion should be published, 7,000 to be distributed to members of the House, 2,000 to members of the Senate, and 1,000 to the Executive Departments. Now, if the copies which this resolution contemplates are in addition to those already provided I am willing to vote for the resolution; but if this resolution supersedes the action already taken I think we ought to be very prudent in passing upon the question.

Mr. MCMILLIN. This resolution supersedes the existing law as to the future volumes, and makes an addition as to the past. It takes the distribution of future volumes out of the hands of members of the House.

Mr. SPRINGER. I find that the House does not understand this proposition at all.

Mr. FISHER. Will the gentleman answer a question?

Mr. SPRINGER. I will answer any question if I have time. The gentleman from Missouri, chairman of the Committee on Printing, desires to make a statement in regard to this matter.

Mr. VAN HORN. Mr. Speaker, this does not interfere with the right of members to distribute these volumes as they may please. It retains that right just as it is, but it fixes their distribution permanently. That is to say, that the institutions to which the members of the present House direct these books shall be sent will receive all these volumes as they are published. The next House of Representatives will have nothing to do with their distribution. This resolution directs permanently how these volumes shall be distributed by the members of the present House of Representatives. You get not only what you are entitled to for this year, but the libraries which are designated by the present members of Congress will get them until the entire series has been published.

Mr. BINGHAM. What number?

Mr. VAN HORN. The number is not changed. That is fixed by the general statute, and this merely directs how the volumes shall be distributed as they are published.

Mr. BINGHAM. Is not the number reduced?

Mr. VAN HORN. The number is fixed by law, and this bill does not in any way disturb that number. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. AIKEN. Allow me just one minute.

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes; if you wish to ask a question.

Mr. AIKEN. I wish to say to gentlemen that my understanding of the present proposition is that all these volumes are to go to the public libraries. Now, in the past twenty-four hours I have been ransacking the whole city of Washington in order to buy some of these volumes for the distribution of which we are now asked to provide. They are selling in this city at $1.75 a volume. I paid $6.75 for two sets for private individuals who do not live within twenty-five miles of a public library. I hold it is as much our right and duty to supply our constituency with such valuable works as to provide them for public libraries where nobody will see them but students.

Mr. SPRINGER. It is not a question as to the number of these volumes, but the question is as to their distribution.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I think we ought to let this matter go over until next Monday and adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the opinion that two-thirds have not voted in the affirmative.

Mr. SPRINGER. I demand a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 54, noes 72.

So (two-thirds not voting in the affirmative) the rules were not suspended.

Mr. RANDALL. I wish some member on the other side of the House would move to adjourn.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. I move the House adjourn. [Cries of "No!"]

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. I withdraw it.

Mr. WISE, of Virginia. I renew it.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 84, noes 32.

So the motion was agreed to.

FUNERAL EXPENSES OF A CONTESTANT.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] desires to correct a resolution passed on Saturday last, and pending the motion to adjourn. If there be no objection his proposition will be entertained.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. On Saturday last a resolution was adopted directing the Sergeant-at-Arms to pay out of the contingent fund of the House not exceeding $300 for the funeral expenses of Mr. Smith, of Alabama, a contestant. Now, the fact is the Sergeant-at-Arms has not control of any contingent fund of the House, and the proposition is to amend the resoluion so as to insert "the Clerk of the House" instead of the Sergeant-at-Arms.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

DEFICIENCY IN ARMY PENSIONS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the following message from the President; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a communication from the Secretary of the Interior submitting a copy of a letter from the Commissioner of pensions inviting attention to the fact that the "deficiency" appropriation of $16,000,000 to meet the June payment of Army pensions should be available as early as the 25th instant if practicable in order to avoid any delay in payment.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, May 15, 1882.

OSAGE INDIAN INTEREST PAYMENT.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the following message from the President; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a communication dated the 11th instant from the Secretary of the Interior, together with estimate of appropriation and accompanying papers, to provide, in accordance with treaty stipulations and existing laws, for the payment of certain interest due the Osage Indians. The subject is presented for the consideration of Congress.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, May 15, 1882.

IOWA CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House additional evidence in the case of John C. Cook vs. Madison E. Cutts, from the sixth district of Iowa; which was referred to the Committee on Elections.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. JOYCE, for two weeks, on account of important business.

To Mr. CABELL, for four days, on account of important business.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. COLERICK was granted leave to print in the RECORD, as part of the proceedings, some remarks in support of House bill No. 6018, relating to the recovery of damages for infringement of patents. [See Appendix.]

And then (at four o'clock and fifty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. CRAPO: The petition of James M. Coffin and others, of Nantucket, Massachusetts, for passage of the French spoliation claims bill—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. GEORGE R. DAVIS: The joint resolution of the Legislature of Illinois, urging the speedy trial or unconditional release of American citizens confined in foreign prisons, and require such recognition of our citizens abroad as comport with our national dignity—to the same committee.

Also, the petition of the Excelsior Oil-Stove Manufacturing Company, J. D. Bangs & Co., and 40 other manufacturers and dealers in oil stoves of Chicago, Illinois, protesting against the passage of any bill extending patents upon oil stoves—to the Committee on Patents.

By Mr. DIBBLE: Memorial of SAMUEL DIBBLE, member of the House of Representatives from the second Congressional district of South Carolina—to the Committee on Elections.

By Mr. McCOOK: The petition of Margaret L. Worth, daughter of the late General William J. Worth, for a pension—to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. McLANE: The petition of P. Zell & Sons and 39 other firms of Baltimore, Maryland, for the passage of the Lowell bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. MORSE: The petition of Sarah C. Raymond and others, for the passage of the French spoliation claims bill—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. OATES: The petition of A. McGee and 320 others, citizens of Coffee County, Alabama, for an appropriation for educational purposes—to the Committee on Education and Labor.

By Mr. G. D. ROBINSON: The petition of J. T. Varnell and 200 others, butchers of the District of Columbia, petitioning against the passage of the House bill relating to the Washington Abattoir Company—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. THOMAS: The petition of John F. Woodward, for relief—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. J. T. UPDEGRAFF: The petition of Rev. S. W. Pringle and others, in behalf of the congregation of the Presbyterian Church of Mount Pleasant, Ohio, in favor of Government aid to education in Alaska—to the Committee on Education and Labor.

By Mr. WALKER: Papers relating to the claim of Pardon Worsley—to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. WEBBER: The petition of Elizabeth Moffat Edwards, for the passage of the French spoliation claims bill—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. YOUNG: The petition of Theo. T. Edgerton and 11 other business firms of Florida, for the passage of a bill providing for the taxation of glucose—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, May 16, 1882.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

THE JOURNAL.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. An error crept into the Journal which should be corrected. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] presented a report from the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment yesterday on Senate bill No. 133. It was the intention of the Chair to order not only the printing of the report but of the testimony which was submitted by way of appendix to the report. The printing will be ordered, and the Journal will be so corrected as to show the fact. The Journal as corrected will be approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. McPHERSON. I present a petition of the mayor and board of aldermen of Jersey City. The petition is quite lengthy, and, as I suppose I have no right to read it, I will state as briefly as I can what it contains. After reciting certain great wrongs which have been perpetrated upon citizens of the United States by foreign countries, especially the British Government, it goes on to say:

That we, the members of board of aldermen of Jersey City, enter our solemn protest against the base surrender by James G. Blaine and James Russell Lowell of our rights as citizens of this Republic.

Resolved, That we respectfully but earnestly call upon the President of the United States to uphold and sustain American citizens in their right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness while residing in Great Britain or any other land, and that he shall insist that they shall not be deprived of their liberty unless charged with the commission of some crime, for which they shall be brought to a speedy trial under the ordinary law governing such offenses.

Resolved, That we believe the pusillanimity displayed by James Russell Lowell in his intercourse with Earl Granville on the question of protecting American citizens has demonstrated his unfitness to represent this Republic at the Court of St. James; we therefore respectfully ask the President of the United States to recall him and fill his place by appointing some citizen who will protect our fellow-citizens and uphold the honor of our country.

I ask that this petition may be received, and I move its reference to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, presented the petition of James McDonald & Co. (limited) and other firms of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania; the petition of A. Guckenheimer & Bros. and other distillers of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania; and the petition of Schmidt & Friday and other dealers of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, praying for the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 5656) to amend certain laws relative to distilled spirits in special bonded warehouses; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of the George Washington branch of the Irish National Land League, praying for such action on the part of this Government as will result in the release of American citizens now imprisoned in Ireland; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented resolutions of the Coal Exchange of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, favoring the passage of the bill relative to the construction of bridges over the Ohio River; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the petition of Calvin A. Craig Post 75 Grand Army of the Republic, praying for the passage of the bill granting a pension of $40 a month to soldiers who have lost a limb in the service; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a memorial of T. D. Casey & Co. and others, citizens of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, remonstrating against the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 5656) to amend certain laws relative to distilled spirits in special bonded warehouses; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of Colladay, Trout & Co., of Philadelphia, and the petition of the Philadelphia Board of Trade, praying for the passage of what is known as the Lowell bankruptcy bill; which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented resolutions of the council of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, in favor of the establishment of military workshops at the United States arsenal in that city; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented the petition of W. N. Reynolds and others, citizens of Tunkhannock, Pennsylvania, ex-soldiers of the late war, praying that the right be granted honorably discharged soldiers to locate one hundred and sixty acres of public land upon payment of the regular entry fee; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented resolutions of the William G. Murray Post No. 39 Grand Army of the Republic, of Hollidaysburgh, Pennsylvania, favoring the passage of a bill granting a pension to Mary E. Murray, daughter of Colonel William G. Murray, late a member of the Grand Army of the Republic; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of J. F. Kurtz and others, citizens of Waynesborough, Pennsylvania, praying for the construction of a ship-canal to connect the Chesapeake and Delaware Bays; which was referred to the Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard.

He also presented the petition of James S. Orr and others, citizens of Erie, Pennsylvania, praying for the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 1440) to authorize the United States to accept title to certain lands in that city, and to establish a home for indigent soldiers and sailors; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a memorial of the Board of Trade of Scranton, Pennsylvania, favoring the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 4178) to authorize the purchase of a site and erection of a suitable building for a post-office and other Government offices in the city of Scranton; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

He also presented a memorial of the American Society of Civil Engineers, in favor of the passage of a bill authorizing the President to appoint a commission of experts skilled in the investigation, production, and use of metallic substances and other structural materials, to execute tests and experiments on iron, steel, and other materials used in the construction of bridges, buildings, and mechanical structures, and to deduct useful rules therefrom; which was referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

Mr. HALE presented the petition of George L. Merrill, late second lieutenant Company K, Fourteenth Regiment Maine Volunteers, praying for certain compensation due him as such officer; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of T. W. Bicknell and 8 others, citizens of Boston, Massachusetts, praying for an appropriation for the education of the native people of Alaska; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented the petition of J. C. Campbell Post, Grand Army of the Republic, of Maine, praying for the passage of a bill granting soldiers who have lost one arm, one leg, one hand, or one foot, or suffered disabilities equivalent thereto, a pension of $40 per month; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PENDLETON presented the petition of Eugene Beebe, of New York City, praying for the passage of a bill for the relief of the needy who may come to the country in the anticipated emigration from Ireland; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MITCHELL presented a petition of citizens of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, praying for the immediate repeal of the smaller internal taxes and the reduction of the taxes on whisky and tobacco; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. DAWES presented the petition of Franklin Rives, of Washington, District of Columbia, praying for the purchase by the Government of the United States of the Congressional Globe building; which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. GROOME. I present a petition of a large number of members of the Chemical and Fertilizer Exchange, of Baltimore, and other prominent citizens of that city, in favor of the passage of the Lowell bill for the establishment of a uniform system of bankruptcy. As a bill on that subject has been reported, I move that the petition lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. ROLLINS, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3847) for a public building at Rochester, New York, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4172) to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Syracuse, New York, reported it without amendment.

Mr. HOAR. I wish the members of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds would take some occasion convenient to themselves to state the rule of policy which guides them in recommending the erection of public buildings. We have in the State of Massachusetts twenty cities, we shall soon have twenty-one, all of which are cities larger in population and in business than some cities which have received public buildings recently. I believe there are but two such public buildings in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts; one is the post-office and court-house building in Boston, and the other is the custom-house and post-office at Fall River.

I had supposed that the committee in the past had been guided by the principle that they would not consent to recommend a public building where there were no United States courts held and where there was no custom-house in addition to the post-office needed, unless the city to be accommodated in that way was the capital of a State. I do not know whether the committee desire to make such a statement now, but I would be very glad to know for my own information and to govern my response to constituents who are making inquiries of me upon the subject.

Mr. ROLLINS. I merely wish to say that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds up to this time has only considered such bills as have been referred to the committee by the Senate. I think no bill has been referred to the committee providing for a public building in Massachusetts. I am not aware of it. If there had been, I am sure it would have had proper consideration by the committee. I do not know that we have reported any bill for a public building at a place where there was no United States court. I think we have not. It is possible some bill of that character may have been reported, but I am not aware of it. It has been the purpose of the committee so far to have that point constantly in mind.

Mr. SHERMAN. The rule has been that there should be a custom-house or a court held at the place.

Mr. ROLLINS. Of course we have made reports in some cases for a public building where there was no custom-house.

Mr. SHERMAN. There are many custom-houses at places where there are no United States courts held. I think the rule has always been that there must be either a custom-house or court, as well as a post-office.

Mr. ROLLINS. And where the place was the capital of a State, it has generally been favorably considered by the committee. Later in the session the committee will no doubt make some further explanation in regard to its action in the premises.

Mr. HOAR. I have received communications from persons in some of the Massachusetts cities. I have not introduced bills in those instances, except in one case, the case of the city of Haverhill, which has been recently destroyed by fire. Indeed, I did not myself introduce the bill in that case, but the Representative from that district at my request and suggestion introduced such a bill in the other House; I do not know whether it has been acted upon yet.

I have refrained from introducing such bills because in consultation with members of the committee I understood that their rule and policy had been what the Senator from New Hampshire now states. My calling attention to the subject was not to criticise the committee for not making a report for buildings in Massachusetts cities where no bill had been introduced, but merely to draw from that committee a statement of the policy which had governed them, so that my constituents might understand that I had not been derelict in not introducing bills for the very populous towns which I represent.

Mr. ROLLINS. I believe I am correct in stating that no bill has been introduced for a public building in Massachusetts, not even in Haverhill. I think I had some conversation with the Senator in reference to that city.

Mr. HOAR. That bill has been introduced in the other House.

Mr. PLATT. The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 5236) granting an increase of pension to Joseph W. Seeley, have directed me to report it with a recommendation that it be indefinitely postponed. I have prepared no written report. The ground of the report is that during the pendency of the bill the increase has been granted at the Pension Office, and it has been done since the passage of the bill by the House. I move that the bill be postponed indefinitely.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SLATER. The Committee on Pensions, to whom was recommitted the bill (H. R. No. 2089) granting a pension to William J. Lee, have instructed me to report it back with a report adhering to the former adverse report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. SLATER. Let it go on the Calendar.

Mr. LAPHAM. I should like to have the bill go on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill has been placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. HAMPTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 325) to provide for the erection of a monument to the memory of Major-General the Baron De Kalb, reported it without amendment.

Mr. JACKSON, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1229) for the relief of Arlington M. Harrington, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was ordered to be printed; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. JACKSON. I am also instructed by the Committee on Pensions to ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Robert J. Baugness, praying for a pension, inasmuch as the case is still pending in the Pension Department.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. BAYARD. The Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 5656) to amend the laws relating to the entry of distilled spirits in distillery and special bonded warehouses, and the withdrawal of the same therefrom, have instructed me to report back an amendment in the form of a substitute for the bill. I will state that the measure relates to the proposition to extend indefinitely the period of bonding distilled spirits. The committee have taken speedy action in this question because of its importance to the public revenue, and the extensive business connected with it. The measure as reported will probably be amended in some features in the Senate so as to relieve from giving bonds annually for the tax, in order to prevent hardship, and to continue the present arrangement of giving bonds monthly. I deem it proper to say this much at the time the bill is reported. As I said, there will probably be some amendment to perfect the measure. The object has been to take speedy action upon a measure of importance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar and the amendment will be printed under the rule.

Mr. BAYARD, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1377) for the relief of W. S. Kimball and others, reported it with amendments; and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. CAMDEN, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1341) granting a pension to Anna Maria Young, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was ordered to be printed; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1519) granting a pension to Mary P. Thompson, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was ordered to be printed; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. HARRISON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 558) for the relief of George Tanner, of Mercer, Mercer County, Pennsylvania, late captain of "Captain Tanner's Independent Company of Volunteer Infantry," and others of his command, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was ordered to be printed; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 473) for the relief of William H. Morgan, reported it with an amendment; and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. VEST, from the Committee on Territories, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 181) to establish a United States court in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1499) to restore the Fort Benton military reservation to the public domain, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments; and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

SMITHSONIAN REPORT FOR 1881.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the following resolution, reported it without amendment; and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring.) That 15,560 copies of the report of the Smithsonian Institution for the year 1881 be printed; 2,500 copies of which shall be for the use of the Senate; 6,060 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 7,000 copies for the use of the Smithsonian Institution.

CALIFORNIA COLLECTION DISTRICT.

Mr. FARLEY. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce to report back the bill (H. R. No. 1993) to amend sections 2582, 2583, 2607, and 2684 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the collection districts of California, with amendments, and I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill. It refers to ports of entry, and it will take but a few moments to dispose of it. A similar bill has been passed by the Senate heretofore.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments.

The first amendment was, in line 15, after the word "Santa Barbara," to insert "San Buena Ventura and Huenema;" in the same line, to strike out "a" before "port," and to change "port" to "ports;" so as to make the clause read:

Second. The district of Wilmington; to comprise all the waters and shores of the counties of Santa Barbara, Ventura, Los Angeles, and San Bernardino; in which Wilmington, on the Bay of Wilmington, shall be the sole port of entry, and Santa Barbara, San Buena Ventura, and Huenema ports of delivery.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 36, after the word "for," to insert "each of;" in the same line to change the word "port" to "ports;" and after "Santa Barbara" to insert "San Buena Ventura and Huenema," so as to read:

Second. In the district of Wilmington, a collector, who shall reside at Wilmington; a deputy collector, who shall reside at Wilmington; and one inspector, to be appointed by the collector, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, for each of the ports of Santa Barbara, San Buena Ventura, and Huenema.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. McMILLAN. I report from the Committee on Commerce the bill (S. No. 1810) to authorize the Rock Island and Southwestern Railway Company to construct a bridge over the Mississippi River at New Boston, State of Illinois, with amendments, and I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 1810) to authorize the Rock Island and Southwestern Railway Company to construct a bridge over the Mississippi River at New Boston, State of Illinois, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments reported from the Committee on Commerce will be stated.

The PRINCIPAL LEGISLATIVE CLERK. The first amendment is in section 1, line 14, after the word "stock," to insert "for such reasonable rates of toll as may be approved from time to time by the Secretary of War," so as to read:

And to build and lay on and over said bridge, ways for wagons and vehicles of all kinds, and for the transit of passengers on foot, and also of live stock, for such reasonable rates of toll as may be approved from time to time by the Secretary of War, and to keep up and maintain said bridge for the purposes aforesaid.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 16, after the word "aforesaid," to strike out down to and including the word "kinds" in line 23, in the following words:

And when said bridge shall be constructed, all trains of all railroads terminating at the city of New Boston, or near there, and all railroads terminating on the opposite side of said river, shall be allowed to cross said bridge for reasonable compensation to be made to the owners of the same, under the limitations and conditions herein expressed. The owners of said bridge may also charge reasonable compensation for transit over said bridge of all other kinds.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the end of section 2, to add "at the expense of the owners of said bridge;" so as to read:

That if said bridge when constructed shall, in the opinion of the Secretary of War, be a substantial obstruction to the navigation of said river, the said Secretary shall require said company to change the construction thereof so as to avoid any serious and substantial obstruction to the navigation of said river, at the expense of the owners of said bridge.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, at the end of line 4, to insert "or for passengers or freight passing over said bridge;" so as to read:

That the bridge hereby authorized shall be a lawful structure, and shall be a post-route, upon which no higher charge shall be made for the transportation of the mails of the United States and the troops and munitions of war, or for passengers or freight passing over said bridge, than the rate per mile paid to railroads and transportation companies leading to said bridge.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as section 4:

SEC. 4. That all railroad companies desiring the use of said bridge shall have and be entitled to equal rights and privileges relative to the passage of railway trains or cars over the same, and over the approaches thereto, upon payment of a reasonable compensation for such use; and in case the owner or owners of said bridge and the several railroad companies, or any one of them, desiring such use shall fail to agree upon the sum or sums to be paid, and upon rules and conditions to which each shall conform in using said bridge, all matters at issue between them shall be decided by the Secretary of War upon a hearing of the allegations and proofs of the parties: Provided, That the provisions of section 3 in regard to charges for passengers and freight across said bridge shall not govern the Secretary of War in determining any question arising as to the sum or sums to be paid to the owners of said bridge by said companies for the use of said bridge.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to change section 4 of the bill to section 5.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add the following as section 6:

SEC. 6. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War, on satisfactory proof that a necessity exists therefor, to require the company or persons owning said bridge to cause such aids to the passage of said bridge to be constructed, placed, and maintained, at their own cost and expense, in the form of booms, dikes, piers, or other suitable and proper structures for the guiding of rafts, steamboats, and other water-craft safely through the passage-way, as shall be specified in his order in that behalf; and on failure of the company or persons aforesaid to make and establish such additional structures within a reasonable time, the said Secretary shall proceed to cause the same to be built or made at the expense of the United States, and shall refer the matter without delay to the Attorney-General of the United States, whose duty it shall be to institute, in the name of the United States, proceedings in any district court of the United States in which such bridge, or any part thereof, is located, for the recovery of the cost thereof; and all moneys accruing from such proceedings shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out section 5, in the following words:

SEC. 5. That Congress may at any time amend or repeal this act.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

SEC. 7. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved. And the right to require any changes in said structure, or its entire removal at the expense of the owners thereof whenever Congress shall decide that the public interest requires it, is also expressly reserved.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not object to that amendment, but it is a pretty vigorous provision, I think.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DONATION OF THE TONER COLLECTION.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am directed by the Joint Committee on the Library to report a joint resolution and to ask for its immediate consideration. The reading of it will show the nature of the measure.

The joint resolution (S. R. No. 66) to authorize the Librarian of Congress to accept the library offered to be donated to the United States by Dr. Joseph Meredith Toner, of Washington, District of Columbia, was read the first time by its title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be read at length.

The joint resolution was read the second time at length, as follows:

Be it resolved, &c., That whereas Dr. Joseph Meredith Toner, of the city of Washington, District of Columbia, has offered to donate to the United States for the use of the public, and for the promotion of literature and science, a large and valuable collection of books on medical science and historical and miscellaneous subjects, upon certain terms and conditions set forth by him in a memorial addressed to Congress, and which is in the following words:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

The memorial of Dr. Joseph Meredith Toner, city of Washington, District of Columbia, respectfully shows to your honorable bodies that he is the owner of a large and valuable collection of books and pamphlets, about twenty thousand volumes or upward in number, treating of medical, scientific, historical, biographical, literary, and miscellaneous subjects, and many of which are very rare and of great interest; and desiring that said collection of books, to the accumulation of which your memorialist has devoted considerable funds and a large part of his life, should be permanently preserved and placed where it would be most beneficial to the cause of science and most advantageous to the public, he respectfully offers said collection to the United States of America, to be placed in the National Library of the United States, at the city of Washington, under the management and control of the Librarian of Congress, upon the terms and conditions following, which he deems to be reasonable and just, and which he trusts will prove acceptable to your honorable bodies, namely:

First. That the collection should be kept separate and apart from the other books and pamphlets in the Library, in separate rooms or alcoves, and that it should be known and described as "the Toner collection."

Second. That the collection of books and pamphlets be bound, when requiring it, in a uniform and satisfactory manner, and have placed on the back of each a parchment band to distinguish them, and that a device destinctive of the donation be stamped on the title page of each, and that they be kept accessible for reference, and be catalogued as speedily as practicable; and when they appear by title in the printed catalogue of the Library that some letter or symbol indicative of the collection be used, and that the condition and growth of the collection be made a matter of record in each annual report by the Librarian of Congress.

Third. That the collection be kept and used mainly for reference and be consulted subject to the rules governing the use of rare books, and be called upon for service only when no other copy of the book or pamphlet asked for is available, and not be taken out of the Library except for special reasons.

Fourth. That your memorialist should be permitted to make additions to the collection from time to time as he may desire, upon the same terms as herein specified, and that he have liberty to insure the perpetual increase of the collection by the establishment of a trust fund for the purpose.

Your memorialist, while desiring to perpetuate his name in connection with the donation which he here proposes to make, believes "the Toner collection" will prove useful and valuable to the country and will involve no unusual expense on the part of the United States.

Respectfully submitted,

J. M. TONER.

Now, the Librarian of Congress is hereby empowered and directed to receive and accept from the said Dr. Joseph Meredith Toner his collection of books and pamphlets aforesaid, and to place the same in the Library in his charge under the terms and conditions set forth in the said memorial.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I only desire to say that Dr. Toner, of this city, proposes to give to the Government of the United States his very valuable library, now estimated to be worth $50,000 or $60,000, which has been accumulated by him during his lifetime, and is to be supported by an endowment in the future. The Committee on the Library were unanimously of opinion that his generous gift should be promptly and gracefully accepted, and have prepared a report on the subject, which I ask to have printed. The joint resolution I hope will pass without objection.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask that the report be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be printed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CONGER (by request) asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1888) to fix the date of entry into the military service and to correct the record of officers now in the regular Army who served as officers of volunteers and regular Army; which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HARRISON asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1889) providing for the reapportionment of the members of the legislative assembly in the Territory of Montana; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. PLUMB asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1890) for the relief of William S. Thatcher; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1891) to re-examine the homestead claim of Ira Haworth; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

FLAGS FOR MECKLENBURGH CELEBRATION.

Mr. VANCE asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 67) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan one hundred flags to the mayor and committee of citizens of Charlotte, North Carolina; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. VANCE. I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution be considered immediately.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution. It directs the Secretary of War to lend one hundred flags to the mayor and committee of citizens of Charlotte, North Carolina, to be used in celebrating the one hundred and seventh anniversary of the Mecklenburgh declaration of independence of May 20, 1775, with such security for their prompt and safe return as he may deem necessary.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENT TO ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MAXEY. I offer an amendment to the army appropriation bill by instruction of the Committee on Military Affairs. I call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to the fact that this is the bill (S. No. 1600) authorizing recruits in the Army to purchase on credit certain articles necessary for their cleanliness and comfort, which has been unanimously reported favorably and is now on the Calendar; but it is believed that immediate legislation is necessary, and being an Army bill we ask that it may be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and considered in connection with the Army appropriation bill. The report of the committee is favorable.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 804) for the relief of Robert Gorthy and Calvin Green; and

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 804) for the relief of Robert Gorthy and Calvin Green was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

DONATION OF THE TONER COLLECTION.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 211) to authorize the Librarian of Congress to accept the library offered to be donated to the United States by Dr. Joseph Meredith Toner, of Washington, District of Columbia, was read twice by its title.

Mr. SHERMAN. That joint resolution is precisely in the words of the joint resolution which has been already passed by the Senate, and I ask that it be put on its passage. It was reported by the Joint Committee on the Library to both Houses, and has been passed simultaneously. We ought to concur in the action of the House.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senate resolution should be withheld from the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution passed by the Senate will be withheld.

Mr. HARRIS. The vote by which the Senate joint resolution was passed had better be reconsidered, and it should be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to reconsider the vote by which the Senate joint resolution was passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the vote by which it was passed will be reconsidered. It is reconsidered.

Mr. HARRIS. Now let it be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, that will be the order. The Chair hears no objection.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT JACKSON.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business the Senate will proceed to the consideration of bills on the Calendar under the Anthony rule.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to proceed at this time to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 5575) providing for a public building at Jackson, Tennessee, and I desire to say that if it consumes more than five minutes I will withdraw the request.

Mr. CONGER. There are five or six bills for the erection of public buildings in which other Senators are interested, and I request the Senator to have the public building bills on the list all considered together and acted upon, as was done on a former occasion.

Mr. HARRIS. I certainly have no objection to the suggestion made by the Senator from Michigan, but it is very important that this little bill should be passed. It appropriates a very small amount; the records of the court are continuously exposed to the dangers of fire; and if the bill is passed now the house can be constructed this summer and fall and the records rendered absolutely secure.

Mr. CONGER. I have no objection to this bill. I thought, however, it would be well to give notice of some day when all similar bills might be considered.

Mr. HARRIS. I certainly have no objection to the suggestion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan can give notice that he will ask the Senate to consider all such bills on a certain day.

Mr. CONGER. Then I give notice that on Thursday next I shall ask the Senate to consider bills on the Calendar making appropriations for public buildings.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill called for by the Senator from Tennessee? The Chair hears none.

The bill (H. R. No. 5575) providing for a public building at Jackson, Tennessee, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GRAIN STEAM-SHOVEL PATENT.

Mr. PLATT. The bill (S. No. 1057) for the relief of George Milsom, Henry Spendelow, and George V. Watson, was passed over without prejudice, and I ask that it be taken up at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is the first case to be called.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. PLATT. There is a report accompanying the bill.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I wish to hear the report read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report consists of four printed pages. However, it will be read if desired.

Mr. MCMILLAN. If the Senator from Connecticut will state the substance of the report, it will be satisfactory to me.

Mr. INGALLS. I think the report had better be read. I have no objection to the Senator from Connecticut stating the case, but I think the report should be read.

Mr. PLATT. I have no objection to the reading of the report.

Mr. INGALLS. If the practice is to be followed that because a report is long it is not to be read, all that will be necessary to secure the passage of a bill without explanation will be to make a long report. I think the report had better be read.

Mr. PLATT. I prefer that the report shall be read.

The Principal Legislative Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. PLATT on the 16th of March:

The Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the petition of George Milsom, Henry Spendelow, and George V. Watson, asking for an extension of their patents for an improvement in the mode of unloading vessels, respectfully report:

That on the 2d day of August, 1864, letters patent No. 43751, for an "improvement in mode of unloading vessels," were issued to the said Milsom, Spendelow, and Watson; on the 22d day of November, 1864, letters patent No. 45197, for an "improved grain-shovel," and on the 28th day of March, 1865, letters patent No. 47030, for an "improved apparatus for leveling grain in a vessel's hold," the three patents constituting together what is known as the steam-shovel, as specially used at the city of Buffalo, in the State of New York. The second and third inventions were improvements upon the first, and the combination of their various elements produced a practical steam grain-shovel.

Grain-elevators have been in use at Buffalo for thirty-five years, and when these letters patent were issued all the grain that arrived at that port by lake was shoveled exclusively by hand in the process of unloading. The shovelers, compelled to work in the holds of vessels when feeding, the elevator legs projected from the elevators, were enveloped in clouds of dust that penetrated their lungs and seriously impaired their health.

To remove this embarrassment and expedite also the unloading of vessels, Milsom, Spendelow, and Watson constructed the machine covered by these letters patent, which consists of a combination of shovels or scoops with ropes and pulleys attached to and worked in the holds of vessels by steam-power applied from the elevators, the shovels being extended further and further from the hatches as the elevator-legs sink into the holds, and the shovelers simply guiding and feeding the machine, operations that do not raise the immense clouds of dust that are inseparable from unloading grain-vessels by hand.

Upon obtaining their patents, the petitioners with others organized The Buffalo Patent Grain-Shoveling Company, and in order to prevail upon certain elevator-owners at the said city of Buffalo to introduce and use this shovel in connection with their elevators, they gave to them half of the stock of this company; but so violent was the opposition of the shovelers of grain by hand to its use that for twelve years the petitioners and these elevator-owners were deterred from using it. The shovelers of grain by hand at Buffalo were then as now organized into and controlled by a shovelers' union, and apprehending a loss of employment from the use of this steam-shovel, in July, 1865, they struck for higher wages, compelled men in the employ of elevator-owners who were endeavoring to use the steam-shovel to leave them, frightened and intimidated these men by threats of violence, waylaid them in going to and from their work, and through the shovelers' union prevented other men from taking their places, and assaulting and driving them away whenever they attempted to work with the steam-shovel.

This state of affairs continued until the spring of 1874, when the opposition of the hand-shovelers was in a measure overcome; but not until the year 1877 did the shovelers commence working harmoniously with the steam-shovel.

Meantime, and while this struggle was going on, the petitioners, who were poor men, and had incurred heavy expenses in procuring these patents, and in endeavoring to put their steam-shovel into practical use, were compelled to sell the rest of their stock in the said shoveling company to pay the debts that they had so incurred and to meet their necessary personal and family expenses.

They endeavored to introduce this shovel in the cities of Erie, Oswego, Philadelphia, and New York, but in every instance they were violently opposed by the hand-shovelers, and, after spending much time and money, were compelled to abandon all further efforts in that direction.

Four thousand bushels an hour is a large average for shoveling grain by hand. With the steam-shovel from 8,000 to 10,000 bushels an hour are readily shoveled, and where two elevator legs can be used in a vessel at the same time, 20,000 bushels an hour have been shoveled.

Here there is an obvious and marked saving of time in unloading grain vessels. They are much more quickly made ready for their outgoing cargoes, and the expenses incident to remaining in port are materially lessened. The rates for shoveling grain at Buffalo are $4 per thousand bushels for sail-vessels, and $4.50 per thousand for propellers and steamers; and they have been placed at these figures by the grain-shovelers, who, through the shovelers' union, control the price of shoveling, and so control it without reference to the steam-shovel, for the price of shoveling grain is the same whether the steam-shovel is used or not.

This price for shoveling in sail-vessels is divided as follows: $2 a thousand are paid to the shovelers, $1.50 a thousand to the elevators, and 50 cents a thousand to the steam shovel, and for propellers and steamers, which pay $4.50 a thousand for shoveling, $2.25 a thousand are paid to the shovelers, $1.75 a thousand to the elevators, and 50 cents a thousand to the steam-shovel.

When the steam-shovel cannot be used, as is particularly the case in certain portions of the holds of propellers and steamers, where the grain is shoveled entirely by hand, the whole price is paid to the shovelers, and is not reduced.

It appears also that the cost of shoveling grain at Buffalo, where alone this shovel is used, has not been increased by such use.

In 1880 the shovelers' union raised the price of shoveling from $3.50 per thousand bushels on sailing-vessels and $4 per thousand on steam-vessels to $4 and $4.50 respectively, its present price, and when this demand was made by the shovelers upon the elevator owners it was complied with, though the latter proposed to allow their share of the shoveling to remain at the old price, but the shovelers insisted that the general price of shoveling should be raised, as they had demanded, and this was done, for the reason that there are parts of the holds of some steamers and propellers in which the steam-shovel of the petitioners cannot be operated, and in the unloading of grain from which the shovelers are paid the full price for shoveling.

Prior to making this demand for an increase in the price of shoveling the shovelers stopped work at all the elevators in Buffalo, whether they used this steam shovel or not, and the whole business of elevating grain at Buffalo was suspended for several days, to the great loss of grain and vessel owners; and this state of affairs continued until the elevator owners acceded to the demands of the shovelers. These statements are fully verified, and the fact, also, that the petitioners' steam-shovel has not increased the cost of shoveling grain at Buffalo. On the contrary, it appears that its effect is to keep such cost down, which, were this steam-shovel not used, would be raised by the shovelers to $5 and $6 a thousand, as there are vessels now in commission upon the western lakes that carry upward of 100,000 bushels of grain, in the unloading of which very large gangs of shovelers would be necessary, and it appears that even then it would be very difficult to unload such craft within a reasonable time by hand-shoveling alone.

In addition to the great saving of time effected it is also substantiated that where this steam-shovel is used a vessel can be unloaded without changing its position at the dock, a change that it would be difficult to effect when the harbor is crowded with vessels, or when a strong wind is blowing, and sometimes for many hours impossible to accomplish at all, and yet this is a necessary change when the shoveling of grain by hand alone is resorted to.

It further appears that the unhealthy features of the occupation of these grain shovelers being now eliminated by the use of this steam-shovel, they prefer to work with it, and that no shoveler will now labor in the hold of a vessel that is to be unloaded by hand if he can obtain employment where this steam-shovel is used; and although the remuneration of this class of men per thousand bushels is greater when shoveling is done exclusively by hand, it appears that they yet make better wages when working with this steam-shovel, from the fact that by means of it many more thousand bushels a day can be unloaded than can possibly be shoveled by hand in the same space of time; and from the further fact that the money received for trimming grain in canal-boats loaded at the various elevators is divided among a much smaller number of shovelers when the steam-shovel is used than when the shoveling is done by hand.

The petitioners severally make detailed and sworn statements of their receipts and expenditures in inventing the said shovel, and endeavoring to introduce it, and from those statements it appears that their aggregate receipts for the last seventeen years have been the sum of $38,703.28, and their expenses $20,350, leaving to them a balance of total net income of $18,353.28, received as follows:

George Milsom	$5,320 72
Henry Spendelow	4,027 85
George V. Watson	9,004 71
Total	18,353 28

For Milsom this is an average of $312.98 a year; for Spendelow of $236.93; and for Watson of $529.69, which your committee, in view of the struggles made by these petitioners to introduce this invention, the opposition they have encountered, and the difficulties they have had to contend with, do not consider as the reasonable compensation for the labor and time spent by them that is contemplated by law.

The rights of the said shoveling company to this invention and all interest therein on the part of this company ceased on the 2d day of August, 1881, and an extension of these patents will inure alone to the petitioners, who have made no assignment of such an extension as they may be able to obtain.

This steam-shovel has now become a valuable and profitable invention.

By means of it millions of bushels of grain are shoveled annually at the said port of Buffalo, but it did not become profitable until the petitioners were compelled, without fault or neglect on their part, to dispose of all their interest in the original term of the said patents as stated in their affidavits, for the said city of Buffalo, where alone it has ever been put to profitable use.

It is possible now for the petitioners to be reasonably remunerated for the time, labor, and money spent by them in inventing this shovel and endeavoring to bring it into use, and in the judgment of your committee a seven years' extension is sufficient for this purpose.

It finally appears that the shovel has never been, to any extent, a tax upon commerce or a burden or charge upon grain. It distributes the cost of shoveling grain but does not increase that cost. What before its introduction was paid to the hand-shovelers exclusively, is now divided between the shovelers, the elevator owners, and this shovel, in the proportions stated.

One of the patents expired on the 2d day of August, 1881; one on the 22d day of November, 1881; and the third will expire on the 28th day of the present month.

It appears, therefore, to your committee—

First. That the said inventions are of great public value;

Second. That the petitioners have failed to receive reasonable compensation for the labor and time spent by them in perfecting the said steam-shovel and in their endeavors to put it to profitable use;

Third. That their failure to receive reasonable compensation for the labor and time spent by them in perfecting their said invention was without their fault or neglect;

Fourth. That there is now a reasonable prospect that the proposed extension of the said patents would secure to the petitioners the "reasonable compensation" that they should have; and

Fifth. That the public has never paid anything whatever for the use of the said steam-shovel, and will not only not be unreasonably burdened by the extension of the patents for which the petitioners ask, but will not be burdened at all by such extension.

For the foregoing reasons, and believing that the ingenuity and labors of these patentees should be properly rewarded, the committee report the bill back to the Senate with a substitution of seven years in the place of ten, as the term of the extension of the patents of the petitioners, and recommend its passage.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to have some explanation of the necessity of this. The report is very long, and I do not conceive that it gives any sufficient reason why this monopoly should be granted and continued to these parties. I want to call attention to one fact: the patent has expired; men have gone and invested their money in these shovels and have manufactured them, as they had a perfect right to do. Now, if the patent is extended, those men lose the money they have invested in these machines, and no protection is afforded to them at all.

Mr. HOAR. This is not a manufacture at all.

Mr. COCKRELL. After the patent-right expired any man had a perfect right to construct one of these machines and put it to work, and men have constructed them and put them to work, and now they are to be deprived of the right of using them by this bill. I shall offer an amendment, after I hear the Senator's explanation, to cover that point.

Mr. PLATT. This case, Mr. President, does not differ in that respect from any ordinary case of the extension of a patent. This grain-shovel has never been used, except at Buffalo, in the State of New York. I think it never will, from the nature of the case, be used anywhere else. It is not adapted for use at any point except where grain is brought in large quantities by vessels and unloaded from those vessels into cars or into canal boats.

Mr. INGALLS. Does not that condition apply to Chicago and Milwaukee?

Mr. PLATT. I do not understand that it does. As I am informed it cannot be used at any places except Buffalo, Oswego, and Erie.

Mr. COCKRELL. Why not?

Mr. PLATT. I have already stated that the course of trade is such, the quantities of grain transported are such——

Mr. INGALLS. Grain is brought to Chicago in vessels in enormous quantities and transferred by elevators to railway trains, and also at Milwaukee.

Mr. PLATT. That may be; but the fact is that this is not and has not been used at Chicago and Milwaukee; and I am told is not adapted for use at those points by reason of the peculiar nature of the transportation. The Senator from Wisconsin, I think, is fully informed upon that subject. I think there is no mistake in this statement. It has been used at Buffalo. The shovels are used by the elevator owners there, and have been used by paying a royalty to these patentees or to the shovelers' company, which has had these patents by assignment. There is no opposition, I will say to the Senator from Missouri, so far as I know, on the part of the persons using the shovelers; and that is a sufficient answer, I imagine, to his objection. These persons are poor people; they have been subjected to very great troubles and annoyances, by reason of which they have not been able to obtain any benefit or remuneration from their patent except for the past few years. The price of shoveling grain was controlled originally by the hand-shovelers, whose work this invention to some extent superseded. They rebelled against its use for a great number of years; they would not allow the elevator owners to use it; and it was only in 1874 that it first came into use at all; and it is only recently that it has had any considerable use which has resulted in a compensation to the owners of the patent and the patentees.

The only objection which I have ever heard to the extension of this patent which would have been valid if it had been founded in fact, was that it added to the cost of transportation. I do not think that is so for this reason: the price of shoveling is and will be continually controlled by the hand-shovelers; they have a shovelers' union; and if what has heretofore been paid as a royalty to this patent is not paid for the use of the patent, it will go either to the hand-shovelers or to the elevator owners. At present, since the expiration of the patent, it goes to the elevator owners, and they use it to control trade with, to go around and bid for trade; but the shovelers will insist upon having what has been paid as a royalty on this if the patent should not be extended.

Whatever we may say about the propriety of trades unions and their regulating prices, it is nevertheless true that the shovelers' union do regulate the price and will control the price of shoveling grain, so that there will be just as much paid where this is used and can be used without the extension of the patent as there will be with it.

Mr. COCKRELL. I offer the following amendment——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There are committee amendments pending.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move to add to the bill:

And provided further, That any and all persons who may have purchased, constructed, or become the owners of such machinery, or any part thereof, since the expiration of the patent and prior to the passage of this act, shall have the right to use the same without liability for royalty or damage, and without interference on the part of the patentees, their executors, administrators, or assigns.

Mr. PLATT. I would suggest that there are some committee amendments which had better be acted on first, with the consent of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments of the Committee on Patents will be read.

The PRINCIPAL LEGISLATIVE CLERK. In line 6, before the word

"years," the committee propose to strike out "ten" and insert "seven;" so as to read:

That the Commissioner of Patents be, and he hereby is, authorized to hear and determine the application of George Milsom, Henry Spendelow, and George V. Watson for an extension for the term of seven years of letters patent for an "improvement in the mode of unloading vessels," granted to them on the 2d day of August, in the year 1864, numbered 43751.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 11, before the word "years," to strike out "ten" and insert "seven;" so as to read:

Also for an extension for the term of seven years of letters patent for an "improved grain shovel," granted to them on the 22d day of November, in the year 1864, numbered 45197.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 15, before the word "years," to strike out "ten" and insert "seven;" so as to read:

And also for an extension for the term of seven years of letters patent for an "improved apparatus for leveling grain in a vessel's hold," granted to them on the 28th day of March, in the year 1865, numbered 47030.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 34, before the word "years," to strike out "ten" and insert "seven;" so as to read:

And if, upon such hearing, the Commissioner shall be satisfied that the said George Milsom, Henry Spendelow, and George V. Watson, without fault or neglect on their part, have failed to obtain from the use or sale of their said inventions or discoveries a reasonable remuneration for the time, ingenuity, and expense bestowed upon them and their introduction into use, and that it is just and proper that the terms of the said three patents should be extended, the said Commissioner shall make a certificate upon each of them renewing and extending the same, and to each of them, to the said George Milsom, Henry Spendelow, and George V. Watson, their executors, administrators, or assigns, for the further term of seven years from the date of the issuance of the said certificates.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. COCKRELL.]

Mr. PLATT. I hope the Senate will understand the effect of this amendment. I vastly prefer that they should vote down the bill than put the amendment on it, because I prefer that the Senate should do by direction what they choose to do in this matter rather than to do it by indirection. This amendment is just this: here are a few men, elevator owners in Buffalo, who have been using this shovel during the life of the patent; nobody else in the United States has used it, nobody else in the United States can use it; and the effect of the amendment is that the parties who have used it may continue to use it without the payment of royalty. It amounts simply to making the whole bill nugatory.

Mr. GROOME. I am under the impression that this is the same proposition for the renewal of a patent about which I have received very earnest remonstrances from leading business men of the city of Baltimore, who conceive that the renewal of this patent would do a very great injustice to those who are engaged in the grain trade there. That being my belief, in order that I may have an opportunity to inform myself if this is the renewal against which they protest, I object to the further consideration of the bill at this time.

Mr. PLATT. I beg the Senator to consider that this bill has been considered for a long time this morning, and it seems to me it might as well be disposed of at the present time. We simply waste the time of the Senate by considering a matter for half an hour or three-quarters of an hour, and then have it go over under objection, and if the Senator insists upon his objection I shall move to take up the bill, notwithstanding the objection, for I think we ought to dispose of it at the present time.

Mr. GROOME. I will simply say that when a bill is called up, as I believe was the case with this one, out of turn, when Senators were not looking for it——

Mr. PLATT. It was once passed over for examination.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is called up in its order now.

Mr. GROOME. I was absent during Friday, and I was not aware of the condition of the Calendar. I believe this is the bill to which leading men of my constituency very urgently object. Believing that, I feel bound to interpose this objection in order that I may have an opportunity to examine letters in my possession, and see whether I am right in that belief. That being the case I interpose the objection. Of course the Senate will act upon it as to it may seem best.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maryland interposes an objection, and the case loses its place unless it is continued.

Mr. PLATT. If the Senate will indulge me for a moment, although I am not strictly in order, I do not wish to move to take this bill up out of its order as against the objection made in good faith by the Senator from Maryland——

Mr. HOAR. Let it go over without prejudice.

Mr. GROOME. I am satisfied with that course.

Mr. PLATT. I suggest that the bill go over without prejudice, and that it be called up again in a short time.

Mr. GROOME. That was what I intended to accomplish.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go over without prejudice.

WILLIAM H. CROOK.

The consideration of the bill (S. No. 696) for the relief of William H. Crook was resumed as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CONGER. I move, in the twelfth line of the bill, after the word "being," to insert "two-thirds of," and in the same line, after the word "same," to insert "amount;" so as to read:

And which services were additional to his regular duties as executive clerk and disbursing agent, the amount being two-thirds of the same amount as was formerly paid for such service.

So as to make it correspond with the amendment already made. The amendment of the committee only allowed two-thirds of the amount heretofore paid for the service, and hence this correction is necessary.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Yesterday I gave notice of an objection to this bill. I think it a mischievous bill, and one that ought not to pass; but on reflection I have no objection to its being considered and letting it stand on its merits. I wish to say a word about it.

Previous to 1878 there had been a special officer to sign land patents. In June, 1878, the Committee on Appropriations believed that that expense ought to be saved to the Government. The pay had been $1,500 a year, but we repealed the law which formerly provided for the appointment of a person for this particular purpose, and provided in the same act that the duties should be performed by one of the executive clerks of the President, and that the President should designate that clerk. Under the law of 1878, Mr. Crook, I suppose, was designated and has performed the duties since, as I understand from the report. The claim that is made by the party claimant—for it is nothing but a claim—is for extra duties as he says. If that be allowed, cannot each and every other clerk in any of the Departments where additional duties have been assigned to him ask extra compensation? This gentleman has been paid regularly the salary allowed to the position he held.

Mr. MAXEY. Let me suggest that section 1765 of the Revised Statutes prohibits the payment of extra compensation to any officer or clerk by reason of the discharge of duties which belong to any other officer or clerk, and forbids any allowance or compensation for any extra services whatever which any officer or clerk may be required to perform unless expressly authorized by law; and I have a decision of the Supreme Court on that very case.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senator is correct as to that; and I intended to speak of it directly.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I think if the Senator will examine the statute which prohibits double compensation he will find that it applies only to officers whose annual compensation equals or exceeds $2,500 a year.

Mr. COCKRELL. Not at all.

Mr. MAXEY. Any of them. It is the broadest statute ever put on the statute-book.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. It embraces all officers. This proposed compensation must stand upon the basis of any other double compensation. This gentleman, no doubt, is a meritorious person, and has performed his duties properly; but it is a dangerous precedent. Thousands of others are in the same condition, and have performed extra duties.

It is said in this report that 30,000 land patents were signed in a year, and that the work had to be done at night. It will be perceived that an average of 30,000 a year is about 100 a day. It appears to me that I could write my name, or any clerk could write his name, one hundred times in an hour, without taking night after night for it, as the report says was done.

In addition to that, it is known that the appropriation bills have appropriated less for a number of years than the statute allows many of the clerks. They have gone on regularly and taken the sum appropriated; but this claim would open the door in all of those cases for a similar allowance. I think it very dangerous, and it ought not to pass.

Again, we see in the bill that the year 1882 is to be paid for, the year we are now in, and paid for in advance. If this is to pass, we had better renew the old office, and not pay double compensation. It is for service which has not been performed, for it provides for 1882, and 1882 has just commenced.

I hope the bill will not pass.

Mr. MAXEY. Section 1765 of the Revised Statutes, to which I referred, reads thus:

No officer in any branch of the public service, or any other person whose salary, pay, or emoluments are fixed by law or regulations, shall receive any additional pay, extra allowance, or compensation, in any form whatever, for the disbursement of public money, or for any other service or duty whatever, unless the same is authorized by law and the appropriation therefor explicitly states that it is for such additional pay, extra allowance, or compensation.

The case which I had in mind was the Stansbury case, reported in 8 Wallace, decided by Judge Davis, now presiding over the Senate. It was there laid down plainly that whenever a man took an appointment from the Government, he took it with a distinct notice and knowledge of this law, and that he could not receive double pay. Hence (and I asked the question of the Judiciary Committee by a resolution) I could not see, and I do not yet see, how a retired officer of the Army, who is an officer drawing pay, can take employment in the civil service and draw double pay. Unquestionably, if that statute means anything, it means that no man can draw two pays from the Government at the same time.

Mr. PLUMB. I think this bill opens the door pretty wide. I have no doubt it is occurring in all the Departments of the Government every day or every now and then that, by reason of some changed condition, some new duty, some duty not before devolved on an officer, is now devolved on him by executive order. If we establish the rule that a man who goes into a public office, a clerkship, has a vested right to the extent that he shall do no more than the duty which may have been devolved upon him the very day that he went in and that that duty shall not be increased, we are opening the door by this enactment to the payment of additional salaries to men to an extent that we have no conception of at all.

Mr. MAXEY. Will the Senator from Kansas permit me one moment? I ask to be permitted to add to my remarks an extract from the decision before referred to:

The second section of the act of August 23, 1842, declares that no officer of the Government drawing a fixed salary shall receive additional compensation for any service, unless it is authorized by law and a specific appropriation made to pay it. When Stansbury was appointed in 1851 this law was in force, and afforded notice to all employés of the Government of the policy of Congress on the subject to which it relates. The law was passed to remedy an evil which had existed of detailing officers with fixed pay to perform duties outside of their regular employment, and paying them for it, when the Government was entitled, without this double pay, to all their services. The law prohibited, and was intended to do so, the allowance of such claims as these, made by public officers, for extra compensation on the ground of extra services.

But the appellant insists if the above act embraced clerks in the Departments, its operation has been withdrawn from them by the twelfth section of the act of 26th of August, 1842. It is difficult to see how this conclusion is reached, because this section refuses to pay clerks or other officers in the Departments for doing the duties of the other clerks or officers, and refuses further to pay them for extra services of any kind.

There is no inconsistency between the provisions of the two acts, which were passed within a few days of each other, and were parts of a system, intended for the guidance of those in the employ of the Government. These provisions furnished notice to all in authority, that in no event could clerks in the Departments be paid for doing the work of their fellow-clerks, nor could they be paid for any other service, unless it was authorized by law, and followed by an appropriation to pay for it.

Stansbury's appointment was not authorized by law, nor was there any appropriation to pay for the services which he expected to render the Department.

It follows, therefore, that the transaction between Secretary Stuart and himself was in violation of the statute, and cannot be the foundation of an action. (Stansbury vs. United States, 8 Wallace's Reports, page 36 et seq.)

Mr. PLUMB. My theory is that when the Government employs a man it employs all his time. There is no allegation that this man did more than he could do, that he put in more than twenty-four hours a day, and that he was dissatisfied with the employment he had or the salary attached to that employment. He went on perfectly satisfied for one, two, three years on the pay he had, and now at this late day he comes in and claims that before that time this office had been devolved on somebody else, and he should have extra compensation. I say it is opening a wide and a dangerous door. If we pay this man, we must pay others, and I venture to say that there are hundreds of clerks in the Departments to-day that are doing duties which they were not doing at the time they entered the employment of the Government.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Thousands of them.

Mr. PLUMB. Perhaps thousands, as the Senator from West Virginia says. It seems to me we ought to have a fair and just relation and a definite determined agreement existing between the Government and its employés, so that we shall not be called upon from time to time to vote extra compensation because in some way the duties of persons who are in our employment have been enlarged.

I was about to ask the Senator from Michigan when he sat down yesterday whether if the duties which this person has been specifically employed for had been so enlarged as to require him to labor not only during all the day but during a portion of the night, which this report says he was required to labor in, that would constitute a claim for extra compensation or not? What his duties were, I do not know.

Mr. COCKRELL. I will read what the committee say the duties were:

Mr. William H. Crook was then, and had been since 1871, an executive clerk, acting as disbursing officer of the Executive Mansion, and also in charge of the reception room.

Mr. PLUMB. If it had happened in the course of the enlargement of the population of the United States and the general accretion of business about receiving visitors and so on, that this person was required to do a little more duty than had devolved on him at the time he entered the service, could it be said that he would therefore have a claim on the Government for additional salary? I think not. But now in addition to these social duties that belonged to him by his assignment to duty there he was required to sign the name of the President to certain land patents one hundred times a day, a work which did not require thirty minutes, not twenty minutes additional time during the day, and for that he is to have $1,500 a year additional.

Mr. INGALLS. Making an aggregate of $3,500 per annum.

Mr. PLUMB. Making an aggregate of $3,500 per annum. Why, Mr. President, it does not seem to me that this gentleman can possibly come here as a person whose shoulders have been bowed down, and who has been physically disqualified from the performance of other duties and broken down physically by the service he has been required to perform. In fact, he has had less service on his own showing than has been done by many others in the public service who have had less pay.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. President, this officer has performed this additional extra duty which cost this Government $1,500 a year before he was designated as one of the President's secretaries to do it. He has from time to time presented this matter to members of Congress, and he at least has had the assurance of some that they would bring the matter to the attention of Congress and endeavor to have the payment made. If there is anything wrong in the law as to the performance of this duty, this officer might have been notified beforehand, as the President could have designated, as he may do, another secretary at $1,500 a year to perform this one duty under the law.

This officer, Colonel Crook, undertook to perform his regular duties from day to day and from year to year and these additional duties by working extra hours, which he has done. He has saved to this Government for that extra labor in the four years $1,500 a year which was always paid before. Then, as a matter of equity and justice, there should be some remuneration to him.

It is said that there is no law for this, or it is even said that the law forbids this payment. Why, Mr. President, if the law warranted the payment, no one would have occasion to come to Congress for the legislation proposed. It is because it needs legislation, it is because it is casus omissus in the law, where an officer is required to perform duties without pay, that this officer comes to Congress and asks them to give him a reasonable compensation for services already rendered, and which would have cost if the requirements of the law by designating a secretary merely for this purpose, and not performing other duties, had been carried out. That is all there is of it. The President could have appointed a separate clerk, whose whole duty should have been to sign these 30,000 land patents a year, and make the records of them, and return them to the land office, and keep the run of all this business that affected the rights and titles to lands all over the United States, and there would have been no question here.

Your committee thought it might very well, in justice and equity to this officer, who proved his diligence and his extra labors before the committee, recommend to the Senate that a portion of the money which it would have cost to have had a special clerk for this business, should be paid to him for the four years in which he has performed the duties. That is all there is of it. The labor has been performed, the night work and the hard work has been faithfully performed, in addition to all the other duties which constituted the regular service of this gentleman at the Executive Mansion as disbursing officer and as general manager of the Executive Mansion.

I care personally nothing about this matter, although I have always had an idea that when from some failure of the law any poor clerk or poor man had performed extra service it was not very just or equitable to go and say, after he had performed the service and saved the Government this amount of money, that he should not be paid for it. We are continually paying clerks in the House and in the Senate. We passed a bill here within the last two days giving to clerks of the House $400 or $500 for services outside of their duties as clerks of committees. The Senate undoubtedly thought it was equitable, not that the law authorized it, but we made a law to authorize it. This is another such case.

Now, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the very law which forbids what is called double payment says that it shall not be paid without a new provision of law, thereby contemplating that there may be cases where such payments would be just, and this very section says that a man shall not be paid twice or have additional compensation without specific authority of law. What we ask here is the authority of law.

But I have said all and more, perhaps, than I need have said.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, I think I never knew a more indefensible claim than this. It has no support either in law or in equity. The allegations that are made in favor of it seem to me to be totally destitute of merit. The original salary for signing these land-patents was so grossly and extravagantly incommensurate with the labor to be performed that Congress deliberately abolished it, and said that the trivial and inconsequential duties to be performed should be discharged by some other ornamental and decorative attaché of the Executive Mansion. And so it appears that this overworked and debilitated and wrongly treated appendage who had to keep the executive record of the mansion (which is corresponding to the duties of the executive clerk here) and to disburse the moneys that are required to run that establishment, which we are assured by the eminent secretary of a preceding Chief Magistrate, required all the time of that officer, was required, in addition to this, to sign the name of the President to the land-patents one hundred times daily. It is aggregated, in order to make it seem more stupendous, at the number of 30,000 per annum; but inasmuch as there are about three hundred working days in the year, here was a hundred times daily that this afflicted being had to sign the name of the President upon a piece of parchment. Any person familiar with the use of the pen can readily understand that that labor could be performed in thirty minutes by any person of ordinary facility in the use of a pen.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of two o'clock having arrived, the bill goes over.

Mr. INGALLS. I regret that, I wished to make some further observations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has given the Senator two minutes beyond the time. The bill goes over until to-morrow.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. R. No. 67) to loan one hundred flags to the mayor and committee of citizens of Charlotte, North Carolina.

MILITARY LAND-WARRANT LOCATIONS.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill (S. No. 67) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to ascertain and certify the amount of land located with military warrants in the States described therein, and for other purposes.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President——

Mr. SAULSBURY. I wish to offer the following amendment before the Senator from Kansas proceeds:

SEC. —. That no part of the money paid under this act to any of the States mentioned therein shall be applied by such States to the payment of agents or attorneys for services rendered by them in procuring the passage of this act or in connection with the claims of such States to the money hereby authorized to be paid; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to withhold payment to any State until satisfactory assurances shall be filed with him by the authorities of such State that no part of the money paid under this act shall be so applied.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be received. The Senator wants it printed, probably?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be ordered to be printed.

Mr. PLUMB addressed the Senate. [See Appendix.]

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President, this bill is to my mind of a somewhat extraordinary character. The basis of the bill is an alleged contract between the States and the nation made from time to time as the several States known as the land States were admitted into the Union, all of them modeled upon that which is alleged to have been made between the nation and the State of Ohio upon her admission to the Union. It carries us back among the forefathers eighty years, and there we find, in the language which has been read to us by the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. PLUMB,] the basis upon which this bill is founded. In the enabling act approved April 30, 1802, by virtue of which the State of Ohio was admitted into the Union, we find the language which I shall read, and I wish to observe that it is one clause of several clauses to be found in the seventh section of that article. They are independent clauses, and clauses which to my mind are conditions imposed by the sovereignty, by the creator, upon the thing to be formed or created; they are conditions which grow out of the sovereignty of the nation, which it had a right to impose and which it did impose upon the State to be formed and to have admission to the Union by compliance with or by acceptance of the conditions.

The State, so far as it differs in its State organism from that of its Territorial capacity, is so much carved out of the national sovereignty. There are no more people, there is no more territory, there is no greater aggregate of rights and powers in the State and the nation combined after the act of the admission of the State than existed prior to that time in the nation and in the Territory itself. When for the general good, not specially for the good of the people residing in the Territory, only as they are a portion of the entire nation, a component part of the whole, the nation sees fit to impart the rights and privileges of stateship it has the right to impose upon the power of taxation which it conveys to the State, and upon all other powers imparted to the State, such conditions as it may see fit to impose. That is my theory in regard to all the conditions to be found in the enabling act of Ohio and the States which have been admitted to the Union since that State.

The third clause of the seventh section of the act of April 30, 1802, is as follows:

That one-twentieth part of the net proceeds of the lands lying within the said State sold by Congress—

from and after the 30th day of June next, after deducting all expenses incident to the same, shall be applied to the laying out and making public roads—

Not for the benefit of learning, not for the development of science, but for the making of public roads—leading from the navigable waters emptying into the Atlantic, to the Ohio, to the said State, and through the same. Such roads to be laid out under the authority of Congress with the consent of the several States through which the road shall pass.

Then follows the proviso:

Provided always, That the three foregoing propositions herein offered—

I have not read the two preceding ones—are on the conditions that the convention of the said State shall provide, by an ordinance irrevocable, without the consent of the United States, that every and each tract of land sold by Congress, from and after the 30th day of June next, shall be and remain exempt from any tax laid by order or under authority of the State, whether for State, county, township, or any other purpose whatever, for the term of five years from and after the day of sale.

Before proceeding to consider more specifically the nature of the contract, if it is a contract, contained within this clause, I wish to observe that in regard to the imposition of the restriction upon the right of taxation in the State, it was imposed as it seems to my mind, for one reason at least, because at that time it was the custom of the country to sell its lands upon a credit of five years; and if the power to tax was to reside in the State the right to the title which the nation was conveying to the settler, if he should fail to succeed in paying the tax, which might be made very heavy on the part of the State, he would be very liable to lose by virtue of a tax title set up thus by the State against him. In order that he might obtain his homestead, in order that he might have the inducement to settle in the State, as much for the benefit of the State and more for her benefit than that of the country at large, it was necessary that the country should undertake to give him a title to his homestead, and it gave him the five years of credit wherein to pay for it, and agreed to protect him to the end so that he might obtain, in spite of the power that maliciously or foolishly might be exercised against him by the State, his completed title to the homestead. As the country undertook to convey the homestead to him, and offered to him this inducement to settle in the wilderness, it was not only the right but the duty of the country to protect him by a provision of this kind.

Further, when at a later period the country disposed of its lands by direct payments, without taking notes, without giving credits, this language passed naturally, being copied from the original enabling act of Ohio, into the enabling acts of the succeeding States without any special reference to its exact bearing or the reason of its origin. However that may have been, to the last and to-day I hold that it is for the benefit of the State that its power to tax the homestead of the settler for five years should be thus restricted by the nation at large. It is in its nature more for the benefit of the State as well as of the individual who becomes a component part of it. All through the country precisely the same principle is acted upon. It is in my own State, it is in every other State. I do not suppose there is—at least I am not aware of it—a single State in the Union, though there may be some, where it is not a provision of statute law to exempt for a given period of time capital invested, for instance, in manufacturing enterprises and other incipient enterprises which it is for the interest of the State to attract to its borders by favorable laws with reference to taxation. We exempt manufacturing capital in my State for a period of ten years. A town even has the right by a vote of its own people to restrict and to extinguish the power of taxation not only on the part of the town itself but the State also has the complete power to regulate or to extinguish taxation over capital thus invested; and why? Because those enterprises thus founded need aid in their infancy and their weakness, and it is known to be for the ultimate benefit of the community and the State that they should receive favor in this way in their earlier and weaker stages.

Thus it is that this restriction upon taxation, in its nature a benefit to the State as well as to the individual, was not imposed, in my belief, for the benefit of the country at large originally any further than it was necessary to do so in order that the country might exercise good faith with the settler whom it had induced to go into the wilds and make there his home.

I look upon this matter as somewhat aside from the real merits of this controversy. If there is any reason why this bill should pass, it is because there is a legal and equitable right of the States for whose benefit it is proposed that it should become a law. These land States come to us to ask a sum of money in the aggregate, as I think, between five and six million dollars, at least, and it may be more. It becomes a serious matter whether a bill of this kind is to pass in silence and by common consent. It is a pretty serious matter whether the nation at large is to be charged with bad faith if it withholds this five or more million dollars. Those who come here and ask that this legislation shall be enacted must make out a case, it seems to me. Before we have a right to put our hands in the Treasury and appropriate $5,000,000 of money these younger States of the Union should be able to show a legal or at all events a strong equitable obligation which can be imposed upon us as legislators.

The Senator from Kansas produced a table which he asked to have printed in his remarks giving certain important information. I have the same table, I take it, to which I have added some calculations which will give the specific information asked for by several Senators to a much greater extent than the table produced by the Senator from Kansas. It will enable the Senate to see more definitely just what is involved, what States are interested, and the extent to which they are interested.

Mr. MITCHELL. What does Pennsylvania get?

Mr. BLAIR. Pennsylvania is one of the States that are unfortunate in this matter, and she gets nothing. No States come under the provisions of this bill but those admitted into the Union since Ohio, in 1802, and including Ohio, some eighteen in all. This is the table:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., January 26, 1880.

SIR: In reply to your verbal inquiry relative to the quantity of land located with military bounty land warrants up to date, in all the States, I have to inform you that the records of this office show an aggregate location from the commencement of operations under the respective acts to December 31, 1879, of 63,170,760.74 acres, distributed as follows:

States.	Five per cent.	Amount of locations.	Acres.
Alabama	$72,475 69	$1,449,513 75	1,159,611.17

Very respectfully,

J. M. ARMSTRONG,
Acting Commissioner.

Governor R. P. LOWE, Washington, D. C.

I live in a State that does not deal in money very largely; her people pay their taxes, and expect to do so. She got a little of the money distributed in 1836 with the rest of the States that happened to exist at that time. Still I think I am among the last who would hesitate to be taxed and to pay this money if these States were in my belief in law or equity entitled to receive it.

Before proceeding on that point, lest I may forget it, I wish to reply to the suggestion of the Senator from Kansas that the old States, as he calls them, the States which were in the Union, who bore the burden and the heat of the day in the revolutionary war, in the war of 1812, and in the war of 1847, received by virtue of the distribution of the surplus in the Treasury about the year 1836 a considerable amount of money, and that they would feel a great deal easier in their conscience, and somewhat easier in their pockets, if they could be released from the payment of that money.

That money was distributed among the States when the nation was out of debt, and it was done for the purpose of its safe-keeping more than anything else. The nation saw fit to distribute it, and it was distributed upon conditions by which it can be called in again. It was not given outright to the States; it was distributed according to population, I believe, or upon some equitable basis among all the States then in the Union, but upon the condition that it should not be upon interest while thus remaining in the treasuries of the States, and that it might be called in whenever the nation at large chose to do it. The nation has that right. As a citizen of one of the older States, I do not propose to evade the exercise of that right whenever the general good requires it to be exercised; but I am not one of those who will swap the relinquishment of a claim which the Government has upon my State by yielding to what I believe to be a wrongful claim set up by the newer States belonging to the Union. Let each measure stand upon its own merits. If we owe that money and it is for the general good that we shall repay it, let us repay the money, and if the United States owes these newer States five or six million dollars, or whatever it may be, let us pay them; but it is utterly impossible, so far as I can understand this matter, that the one should be in any sense whatever an offset to the other, or that considerations of this kind should influence a Senator from any State in the casting of his vote.

I will make one suggestion in regard to the money which the older States received at that time and the claim now set up by the newer States that they should have this money because the older States have that. That money had accumulated by taxation from burdens imposed upon the States of the Union as they then existed. It was the property of the country as it then was, and as the property of the country as it then was it was distributed to the various States as they then existed and equitably as to the individuals making up the States and the nation at large. Ought States which did not then exist come in forty years afterward and claim as they would claim under a statute of distribution direct from the revolutionary fathers? I think not; they were not in esse at that time. How could they claim money which belonged to the Government at that time? The Government being out of debt, the money was distributed back to the people at large at that date. Whatsoever public property has been acquired since, whatsoever is in the Treasury now, they have their legal rights in, and if this money can be recollected, and it is best to do it and to replace it in the Treasury, then the new States as well as the old States will be entitled anew to its equitable distribution.

But to leave those points and come directly to the merits, as I conceive them to be, of this case, the claim is based on an alleged contract, that the Union said to the incoming State while yet in its formative, proposed condition, "Comply with certain conditions and you shall have certain benefits; you shall have 5 per cent. of the net proceeds of the sales of the public lands hereafter made;" and in nearly every instance that 5 per cent. was to be appropriated to the construction of roads and canals. In only one or two instances, and those of the most recent occurrence, was this money to be given to the promotion of the cause of learning in any form. The very purpose to which it was to be applied indicates that it was the expectation of the Government that it was to be used in the earlier stages of the settlement of the States. It was to make roads, it was to make canals; and in some instances, as in the case of Ohio, the very first cited here, it was to be principally expended in the construction of a highway leading from other States to the new State, in order to make the territory accessible to the emigrant.

That was the principal purpose for which this 5 per cent. was reserved. Subsequently, by an act of Congress, perhaps the very next year, 3 of the 5 per cent. was relinquished to the State of Ohio with the privilege of spending it in her own discretion for like purposes under the direction of the Legislature, and so generally afterward three-fifths of the 5 per cent. was left to the State to be paid directly to the State, to be expended in its own discretion, but for these and like purposes.

It is admitted that the States have received in all instances 5 per cent. of all the money collected by the General Government for actual cash sales to the settlers of the public lands within the borders of these States respectively. It is admitted that what is plain and palpable should have been done upon the natural construction of this language has been faithfully performed on the part of the Government at large; but they come in now and say to us that they should be paid 5 per cent. of the bounty-land warrants issued to stimulate the soldiery, and to aid in defense of the country, located, as they have been, in these various States, which locations were not themselves, in their intrinsic nature, sales of land from the Government to the soldier, but having been located within the territory of these different States they are entitled to their 5 per cent. upon what would have been the money received for the same lands had they been sold for money. The basis of this argument is that the bounty land is given to the soldier as so much valuable consideration for his services, not wages exacted; but, nevertheless, it passes to the soldier, they say, as a consideration for his services in the field, and whatever might be the cash value of the warrant, to the amount of 5 per cent. of that valuation the nation should be answerable to the State.

Of course, at the bottom of this proposition lies the assertion that the soldier rendered his service in consequence of a proffered bounty or of bounty land, and that assertion has gone unchallenged. The fact is, and I ask the attention of the Senate to it as a radical defect in the argument of my friend from Kansas, and that is the basis of the argument in the support of the bill, so far as it has any legal foundation at all—I ask attention to the fact that a very large proportion, far more than half, of these bounty lands were not offered in advance of the services rendered. About seven million acres of the land located under these bounty-land warrants were located under the acts of 1776 and of 1812, immediately preceding, as each did, a war. A small proportion of these bounty-land warrants was located by virtue of the legislation of February, 1847, passed nearly a year after the Mexican war had commenced. But what I wish to assert to the Senate is that about two-thirds of the entire actual locations of bounty-land warrants, in and under which these settlements were made, were made subsequent to the services rendered by the soldier, so that the principle to which the Senators appeal, that the bounty-land warrant was in the nature of compensation, that it was a portion of the wages of the soldier and induced him to render what he did in the field, falls to the ground.

I have here a volume upon The Public Domain, its History, with Statistics, recently published, and from tables to be found upon pages 235 and 237 I read as follows:

The following statement exhibits the warrants in acres issued under several acts of Congress for the revolutionary war and war of 1812:

Revolutionary war.

Act of September 16, 1776..... 2,095,220 acres.

That is the only act which preceded services rendered in the revolutionary war.

Act of February 18, 1801..... 58,260 acres.

That was another act having reference to services rendered in the revolutionary war, but subsequent, you will observe, to the rendition of those services, and by virtue of the provisions of that act 58,260 acres were located. Again—

Act of March 3, 1803..... 11,520 acres.

A quarter of a century after the services were rendered another act was passed, by virtue of the provisions of which 11,520 acres were located, making in all located under the acts relating to the revolutionary war granting bounties for services in the revolutionary war, 2,165,000 acres.

Coming now to the war of 1812, under the act of May 6, 1812, 4,853,600 acres were located. The next act was that of March 5, 1816, giving bounties for services already rendered, you will observe, under which 76,592 acres were located, making in all 4,939,192 acres of land located under the bounty acts relating to the war of 1812, and a total under both the revolutionary war and the war of 1812 of 7,095,192 acres.

Mr. ALLISON. Will it disturb the Senator if I ask him for what purpose he refers to those acts?

Mr. BLAIR. I refer to them as part of something more that I propose to read. My object is to show that most of the bounty-land warrants were issued long subsequent to the services rendered, and that, therefore, they could not have been an inducement for the rendering of those services, and that they in no sense entered into the proper cash computation of what was to be paid to the soldier.

Mr. ALLISON. Those lands the Senator is now speaking of are not at all included in the bill, nor any part of them.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not know about that.

Mr. ALLISON. If I do not interrupt the Senator——

Mr. BLAIR. No, of course not. Go on.

Mr. ALLISON. Those lands that were granted under the acts of 1812 and 1816 were specific grants of land, and were located first in the Territory of Michigan and afterward in the Territory of Missouri. The lands were set apart by metes and bounds, and were not located in any State.

Mr. BLAIR. That was a fact of which I was not aware. That, then, removes so much more of the excess of this calculation. If those lands are stricken out there are very few lands indeed that have been given as bounties for services rendered prior to the act under which the bounty itself is given. It would seem, then, that there is scarcely any basis whatever for the claim that these bounty lands entered into the consideration of the services rendered, and without that I say there is no basis whatever for this bill to stand upon.

I will go further. I have before me an exhibit which shows the amount of scrip issued by the United States to claimants in lieu of land warrants for military service to June 30, 1880. It will be observed that all these issues of scrip are subsequent to any services that could possibly have been rendered for which bounty lands were a part of the contract. They come in as an afterthought. In other words, the bounty land was a gift. There was no money consideration, no valuable consideration whatever, and there can be no pretense set up here that when the United States gives away land there is any valuable consideration for which it should account to the States at the rate of 5 per cent. That is not the argument that is made here, and it cannot be claimed to be net proceeds of sales at all events.

Mr. ALLISON. Would it disturb the Senator to interrupt him further?

Mr. BLAIR. Oh, no.

Mr. ALLISON. I wish to say that the scrip, as included in the table from which the Senator reads, is not included in this bill at all, and all the States have received 5 per cent. on the scrip by law.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask the Senator's attention, then, to the bill. It proposes to have all this scrip accounted for and 5 per cent. paid upon all lands which have been located under military scrip. I am speaking to the bill, not to the facts as the Senator understands them.

Mr. ALLISON. But the scrip has already paid its 5 per cent.

Mr. BLAIR. Then, why does the bill provide for another accounting and 5 per cent. more being paid? I do not like to let a matter of this importance pass just in this way. The bill commences with these words:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to ascertain the amount of public lands entered by the location of military scrip and land warrants in the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Iowa, Nebraska, Kansas, Arkansas, Louisiana, Alabama, Mississippi, Florida, Oregon, Nevada, and Colorado.

Mr. ALLISON. But what I want to say to the Senator is that the scrip which is included in his table there, as I understand it, has already been estimated for and paid to the several States as money.

Mr. BLAIR. Why is it in the bill, then? I ask the Senator that question.

Mr. ALLISON. The law authorized this scrip to be received as money; it was received as money at every land office by statute; and, therefore, it was accounted for in the computation heretofore made as part of the 5 per cent. fund.

Mr. BLAIR. Then it follows inevitably from the Senator's explanation that if they have once got their pay upon the 5 per cent. by this scrip being treated as money they are trying to collect it twice.

Mr. ALLISON. But there is a provision in the bill which says where they have received it once they shall not receive it again.

Mr. BLAIR. If they have received it, and the Senator knows it, why put any provision of that kind in the bill at all? I am dealing with the bill. I do not claim to know all about the intricacies of the matter.

Mr. VOORHEES. If I may interrupt the Senator from New Hampshire, I wish to add to the statement made by the Senator from Iowa in regard to the fact that the Government treated the payment for its lands by these land warrants, as cash payments, the further fact that the registers and receivers of the land offices, as it is well known, received part of their pay for the sales of land made through their offices in a per cent. on the amount received by them in money, and the land warrants that were paid in to them were treated as money in the compensation which they received for such sales.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator means the land scrip, I suppose.

Mr. VOORHEES. They received their pay in a percentage on these land warrants the same as they received their percentage on cash paid in, and in their settlements with the Government the Government allowed them that percentage on these warrants the same as it allowed a percentage on cash paid in.

Mr. BLAIR. All of which comes to precisely the same point that the land located upon the scrip has been once settled for as money, and the 5 per cent. paid. Therefore——

Mr. VOORHEES. The Senator from New Hampshire does not wish to mislead the Senate?

Mr. BLAIR. I do not, certainly.

Mr. VOORHEES. Certainly; the bill expressly declares that the proper officer shall ascertain what land has not been settled for, and it is only on that which has not been settled for that the 5 per cent. is to be paid.

Mr. BLAIR. Then I understand the Senator to admit that there is some that is not settled for, and that the statement of the Senator from Iowa is incorrect in saying that it had all been settled for; and that makes the bill sensible and consistent.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think I can explain it to the Senator.

Mr. VOORHEES. The Senator from New Hampshire either does not understand the bill or he desires to place me in a false attitude before the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. SHERMAN. There was certain scrip issued by the United States that was counted as money, and that was always allowed in the estimate of the 5 per cent. fund.

Mr. BLAIR. I have reference to that issued in the Mexican war.

Mr. SHERMAN. No; those issues were land-warrants.

Mr. BLAIR. No, sir; there was scrip issued.

Mr. ALLISON. It was long before the Mexican war.

Mr. SHERMAN. Long before. I will state the reason why the word "scrip" is used in this bill as I understand it. What is called the Virginia military scrip represented so much money to be paid for in land. It was called Virginia military scrip instead of a land-warrant. It was not an authority to locate a certain number of acres of land, but it was scrip issued for so much money to be paid for in land located within certain bounds of the State of Ohio. That was called the Virginia military scrip. The land warrant is in a different form; the land-warrant was issued for a specific quantity of acres of land. On the scrip that was issued by the United States 5 per cent. has always been allowed to the States and paid, and it cannot be paid again, because here is a provision in the first section of the bill:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior shall exclude from his estimate and certificate all lands so entered upon which the said 5 per cent. has been paid.

But there never has been an allowance for the entries under the Virginia military scrip in Ohio after the admission of the State of Ohio.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not wish to put anybody in a false attitude, and I think every explanation shows that I am in the correct one.

Mr. VOORHEES. In justice to the Senator himself I wish to say that I thought he was using the term "scrip" synonymously with the term "warrant."

Mr. BLAIR. Not at all.

Mr. VOORHEES. The explanation of the Senator from Ohio makes the position of the Senator from New Hampshire intelligible to me.

Mr. BLAIR. I am very glad that the Senator understands me as not occupying a foolish position with reference to the terms of the bill.

I will go on and call the attention of the Senate to the points to which I was speaking, that the bounty-land warrants and the military scrip in the nature of bounty-land warrants were issued prior to the service to only an exceedingly limited extent, and therefore did not enter into the consideration which the soldier received for his labor, toil, and suffering in the field of battle and in the prosecution of war. Therefore, there is no valuable consideration of the kind which is claimed here. The bounty land, the military scrip, stand upon the basis of a gift, and if a gift, under the language of the act which is quoted here, it is utterly impossible to make out any case for the bill. It is necessary to read this table with reference to the scrip, because it is admitted that there is some scrip to be taken into account. I had supposed that this scrip would make the aggregate called for by the bill, which is some four million dollars in its present terms, based nearly upon the bounty-land warrants, perhaps $5,000,000 or $6,000,000 in all.

Mr. SHERMAN. No; that is not all——

Mr. BLAIR. I ask the Senator to reply to me when I conclude, and not to interrupt me in a matter of this kind.

"Scrip" in lieu of land-warrants.

	Acres.
Act of May 30, 1830	393,293
Act of July 13, 1832	300,000
Act of March 2, 1833	200,000
Act of March 3, 1835	585,000
Act of August 31, 1852	1,041,976
Act of June 5, 1858	6,666⅔
Act of February 9, 1863	11,904
Act of July 2, 1862	9,600,000

It will be observed from these dates that these various acts give military scrip for services rendered long before. These later acts were some six, eight, or ten years or more after the Mexican war, and the acts which were passed between 1830 and 1835, inclusive, those of course having reference to the war of 1812 and perhaps to some of the Indian wars, were enacted long after the services were rendered, and as all other land-warrants of the wars of 1812 and 1776 are, by the statement of the Senator from Iowa, to be excluded, down to this date we have not a single acre of land located under any act of Congress which entered into the consideration of services rendered by the soldier.

I read now a statement on the two hundred and thirty-seventh page of the same document, which shows the bounty-land warrant grants under the acts of 1847, 1850, 1852, and 1855, which included nearly all the wars the United States had been engaged in and all operations thereunder to June 30, 1880, and under these acts, especially under the act of 1855, the great mass of the locations took place. I will read the summary:

Act of 1847—

Which was in February, as before stated, and which did precede a portion of the services rendered by our soldiers in Mexico——

Mr. BUTLER. Are those the bounty-land grants for the Mexican war, if the Senator will permit me?

Mr. BLAIR. Yes; I am commencing now with the Mexican war. Under the act of 1847 the number of warrants issued was 88,249; number of acres embraced thereby, 13,209,880; number of warrants located, 86,055; number of acres embraced thereby, 12,920,400. The number outstanding is unimportant. Under the act of 1850 (following the service, you will observe) the number of warrants issued was 189,121; the number of acres embraced by those warrants, 13,165,880; the number of warrants located was 183,522; the amount of land embraced by the actual location was 12,804,040 acres. Under the act of 1852 the number of warrants issued was 11,986; there were 694,120 acres of land embraced by them and 11,727 locations, covering 678,560 acres. Under the act of 1855, which was a general act, including everything from the revolutionary war all the way down and all periods of service rendered from fourteen days or service in a single battle, and extending to the heirs of those who had rendered the service, there were 261,837 warrants issued; 33,958,550 acres of land embraced by the warrants; 247,627 actual locations were made, covering by those locations 32,089,490 acres. There are of all warrants outstanding 22,262, and they cover unlocated lands amounting to 2,535,940 acres.

Concerning the act of March 3, 1855, this document states that it "made 120-acre, 100-acre, 60-acre, and 10-acre warrants, and extended the bounty-land privilege so as to make the entire classes receiving the same some thirty-two in number, in the Army, Navy, and elsewhere. It was a comprehensive act, embracing almost all the wars the United States had participated in. It granted to all officers and soldiers who had served in any war in which our country had been engaged, from the Revolution to the 3d March, 1855, 160 acres each, or so much, with what had been previously allowed, as would make up that quantity. It extended the concession to a service of only fourteen days or an engagement in a single battle, and, in case of death, to the widow or minor children."

These figures dispose of the claim that the bounty land and the scrip land were given for services to be rendered and that they entered into the consideration, which bears very materially, vitally as I think, upon the claim that the Government has received the cash value, and therefore should pay its 5 per cent.

But it is said that this is a sale of the land. In other words, here is a contract between two parties; it is expressed in language, it is a carefully-considered thing by both parties, all the stipulations are thoroughly reflected upon, voted upon, thoroughly canvassed, and finally the contract is made. What is a contract? The law books tell us that a contract is the assent of two minds with reference to a certain subject-matter for a valuable consideration, and all that. I do not want to go into the primary definition, with which the Senate is quite as familiar as I am. This contract is now eighty years old, and what the parties meant who entered into it is the question. What did they themselves understand by the language which they used? Did they understand that the bounty-land warrants were included? Did they understand that anything was included by the word "sales" excepting lands disposed of according to the ordinary definition of a sale—for an agreed price, a price in money or an equivalent in money, cash, checks, negotiable notes, or what not? Did they understand that anything more than that was included? If they did, with this subject-matter in agitation in regard to land-warrants during all these years, should we not have been likely to have heard of it?

When was this first claim set up? I think it was by the State of Iowa. At all events, as the debate in the last Congress showed, if I recollect aright—I have not referred to the debate—the first claim ever made for this 5 per cent. of land undisposed of under the land-warrants and under the scrip was about the year 1858, fifty-five or fifty-six years after the original agreement was made, which was the basis of the agreement between all the States subsequently, as well as between the nation and Ohio.

Whether this language is to be construed technically or not, can it be contended that these people actually meant by the language which they did employ in 1802 and agreed and consented, by that united mind which makes a contract, to that which they did not think of, and which nobody thought of until fifty-five or fifty-six years afterward? It is impossible to state a stronger absurdity than that they meant at the time by the language which they used what they did not think of for more than half a century.

This claim should have been set up years and years ago. The States were paid; they were careful about their 5 per cent. They accepted their 3 per cent.; they accepted their 2 per cent. They have been legislating on this subject all the way through the statute-books from 1802 down, yet never at any time had any claim been made for more than half a century for this 5 per cent. of the supposed cash value of land located under these warrants and this military scrip.

The question is, What is the contract? The contract is what the parties meant at the time, by whatever language they employed. Whether it is to be construed strictly according to the definition which you find in the law dictionaries, or in the text-books, or any other way, the meaning of the parties at the time is the essential thing. Let us get at that. I will not stand upon technicalities. I ask you, Mr. President, and the Senate, if it is a conceivable thing that they meant what they did not think of for half a century? Yet that is the position which the advocates of this bill occupy and must occupy on the record which is made by the statutes of the country, and by the acts of the parties all the way down. They have claimed their 5 per cent. upon the cash sales; they have got it every year; they have made up their accounts carefully right along from 1802, or whatever the time was when these sales commenced, all the way down to the present time, year by year, and if they were being thus robbed, as they say, by the General Government by the location of land-warrants, what is the reason they did not find it out until so recently, and why did they not set up the claim? Why did they not think of it? The position is an absolute absurdity.

But suppose that the bounty-land warrants did enter into the consideration for the service of the soldier, and suppose that some sort of a claim could be got up in the forum of equity for this 5 per cent. Nevertheless, I do not think we ought to consent to vote it away. I do not think that we ought to break down the statutes of the country which have stood now for half a century and more unless really and legally upon the language employed in that contract there does seem to be a contract that such locations should be treated as sales fairly included within a just construction of the language employed.

If that view is correct it is utterly impossible, I think, that anybody shall say that here are any net proceeds which can be made the subject-matter of a cash calculation; that here is any such thing as a sale taking place between the country and the soldier who received these land-warrants. A sale, whether of land or of chattels, is of a specific thing and for an agreed, definite price in money. There is no loose latitudinarian definition anywhere which will bring within the meaning of the term "sale" anything more than what I have specified.

There must be a subject-matter, which may be either real or personal property; there must be a definite, fixed price in money or the equivalent of money; there must be parties, and all that. These things are necessary to enter into a sale, and when these ingredients are found there is a sale, and not otherwise.

Now, what does the soldier receive in this case? He receives a conditional title to certain land which will become absolute when it is located.

But what, on the other hand, does he give? What are the net proceeds? Is it money? Is it cash at all? In any just sense whatever can it be reckoned either as money or as negotiable security or as bank checks or anything convertible or equivalent to or which comes under the proper definition of money? He gives his blood; he gives his life; he gives his services in the field. He gives what may constitute an exchange but never a sale. I cannot see how properly it can be looked upon even as an exchange, but it may be perhaps possible to bring these facts within the definition of an exchange as between the Government and its soldier, but it never can be a sale and nobody ever supposed it was a sale. It never had been construed as a sale from the beginning down to the year 1858, or about that time, when our fellow-citizens of Iowa, being unusually sharp, sharper than all the rest of us, conceived the thought of turning this whole thing into cash and getting their 5 per cent. Never until then was it conceived.

It is perhaps a waste of time for me to occupy the attention of the Senate on this subject any longer. There are many other points to be touched upon, but as I see it is getting late, and as there may be others who may like to speak upon the question, I will say but a few words more.

I cannot conceive how any of these new, strong States can complain of the treatment they have received from the General Government. Here is Indiana coming in for $82,000 of this money, who complains that she has not been used aright, and yet to-day she has got a common-school fund of over $9,000,000. My friend from Ohio told us the other day that the irreducible State debt of Ohio was its school fund, and I see it was $4,289,000, and probably before this time it is $4,500,000. Ohio has so great an accumulated school fund as that; Illinois has $6,000,000, if I recollect aright. Every one of these States has received of the bounty of the Government in the form of land millions, and millions and millions of acres more than she is entitled to if every particle of this bounty land and scrip land had been located according to her own will; and can they claim that the policy which carried the soldier into their territory is a policy which deprives them of all advantages of early settlement and of the better form of population?

The State would prefer the policy to be pursued which would locate the soldier within its limits rather than any other emigrant whatever, and that is what has been done wherever these warrants have been actually located. To be sure, in some instances speculators got hold of them, but I am talking about the general drift of the policy. The effect has been to put the soldier within the limits of the States which come now and ask for this 5 per cent.

The grants for homesteads, the grants for railroads, given for the benefit of the States, as well as of the nation at large, have been immense in area; and under all these circumstances, when those States have grown rich and large and plethoric, and can from the heights of their prosperity look down upon the comparatively meager hopes and realizations of the original thirteen, how they can come here and make up their faces and ask of us this little trivial contribution is entirely beyond my comprehension. Here we are as a nation to-day with a bill pending in both Houses of Congress offering to these States, as far as education is concerned, a much larger proportion than this amount.

We offer to Alabama $1,000,000 in one bill, $750,000 in another; Mississippi in the same proportion; Louisiana, Arkansas, and so all the way around through every one of these States which come here clamoring for 5 per cent. upon the public lands. We are by bills to-day offering more money out of the national Treasury for the benefit of their schools, notwithstanding the immense school funds which several of them already have, than they will get if they collect their proportion of this 5 per cent.

The State of Iowa, which located about 14,000,000 acres under these land warrants, will recover only $800,000 or $1,000,000 under the provisions of this bill. I should be a little ashamed to come here and ask for that. My friend, the Senator from Iowa, shakes his head. Then, if that does not shame him, I will spend a few nights in reflection on the subject; but I very much doubt whether I shall ever be able to perceive what will.

The bill ought not to be passed. If I have said enough to attract attention to it I am satisfied. I believe it should be killed.

Mr. GARLAND. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After seventeen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at four o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, May 16, 1882.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. F. D. POWER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PENSIONS TO WIDOWS AND CHILDREN.

Mr. PRESCOTT, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6229) to amend section 4706 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as to payments of pensions to widows and children; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM WHEELER HUBBELL.

Mr. WARD, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6230) to determine the rights of William Wheeler Hubbell and the United States, respectively, therein stated; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM YAHN.

Mr. DUNNELL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6231) to rerate the pension of William Yahn; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

A. J. HUNT.

Mr. DUNNELL also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6232) granting a pension to A. J. Hunt; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

I. N. WALDEN.

Mr. DUNNELL also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6233) granting an increase of pension to I. N. Walden; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

JEROME DANE.

Mr. DUNNELL also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6234) to rerate the pension of Jerome Dane; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

LEGALITY OF CERTAIN ACTS OF UNITED STATES OFFICERS.

Mr. TAYLOR, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 3013, a bill (H. R. No. 6235) to confirm and declare legal the acts of certain officers of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

LIABILITY OF ACCESSORIES AFTER THE FACT.

Mr. TAYLOR also, from the same committee, by unanimous consent, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 1683) supplementary to and amendatory of sections 5533, 5534, and 5535 of the Revised Statutes, for the trial and punishment of an accessory after the fact when the principal escapes, with an amendment; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

BRIBERY OF WITNESSES.

Mr. TAYLOR also, by unanimous consent, from the same committee, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 1684) to punish the bribery of and the acceptance of a bribe by a witness; which was referred to the House Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

BRIBERY OF JURORS.

Mr. TAYLOR also, by unanimous consent, from the same committee, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 1685) to punish the bribery of and the acceptance of a bribe by a juror, with amendments; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT OF REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. TAYLOR also, by unanimous consent, from the same committee, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 1686) to amend and correct section 5390 of the Revised Statutes; which was referred to the House Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

TITLE TO CERTAIN LANDS, WASHINGTON, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. URNER, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 2402) to quiet the title to certain lands in Washington, District of Columbia; which was referred to the House Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

SUPPRESSION OF GAMING, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. URNER also, by unanimous consent, from the same committee, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 1294) more effectually to suppress gaming in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the House Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

REVISED STATUTES, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. URNER also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6236) to amend certain sections of the Revised Statutes relating to the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

ROBERT GORTHY AND CALVIN GREEN.

Mr. SPAULDING. I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar from the further consideration of the bill H. R. No. 804, and ask that it be put upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which objection will be asked for.

The bill was read. It is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Solicitor of the Treasury be authorized and directed to convey, by proper deeds of conveyance, to Robert Gorthy, of Victor, Clinton County, in the State of Michigan, all the interest of the United States in and to the northwest quarter of the northwest quarter and the east half of the northwest quarter of section 17, in township 6 north, of range 1 west, Michigan; and to Calvin Green, of the same place, all the interest of the United States in and to the southwest quarter of the northwest quarter of section 17, and the northeast quarter of the southeast quarter of section 18, in township 6 north, of range 1 west, Michigan: Provided, That the said Gorthy and Calvin Green pay all the costs of the proceedings in court on the bond of Benjamin Ballard, on which they were sureties.

Mr. McMILLIN. Let the report be read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 804) for the relief of Robert Gorthy and Calvin Green, submit the following report:

Prior to the 16th day of March, 1868, Benjamin F. Ballord was arrested on a warrant issued out of the United States court for the eastern district of Michigan for having obstructed a United States marshal in the service of process, and was on said date brought before the United States commissioner for said district and entered into recognizance, with Robert Gorthy and Calvin Green as sureties, to appear to answer an indictment of said court upon said charge on the 2d day of June following, in the sum of $500. He did not appear on said date, nor, as far as appears from the papers, at any time thereafter. Suit was brought on the recognizance on the 19th day of June in the same year, and judgment was rendered in favor of the United States against Gorthy and Green for the penal sum of said bond and costs. Execution was issued; the lands described in said bill were levied upon and sold by the United States marshal for the sum of $585.65.

This judgment was by default, and should never have been entered. It appears from the certificate of the clerk of said court on file in this case that no indictment was filed against said Ballord at the June term of said court or any other term for the offense charged, to wit, for the offense of resisting an officer; that no such indictment is now on file in said court, and never has been; further, that after diligent search he was not able to find any record of the forfeiture of any such recognizance for the appearance of said Ballord, both of which were material to maintain the suit; and we cannot account for the proceedings in said suit, except upon the supposition that some clerk or person not cognizant of the requirements of law instituted it. Subsequently a motion was made to vacate the judgment, which was denied by the court, and we can do no better than to cite as a part of this report a portion of the record and the judge's opinion on denying said motion:

"This was an action of debt conditioned for the appearance of Ballord at the June term of 1868 to answer to any indictment which might be exhibited and filed in this court by the grand jury against him for obstructing a deputy marshal in attempting to serve a criminal process. The affidavits in support of the motion show that no indictment against Ballord was ever found, that the recognizance was never forfeited, and that no steps were ever taken whereby a right of action accrued to the United States. The minutes of the grand jury do not even show that the case was presented to or considered by them. The suit, however, was commenced during the June term of 1868. The default of the defendants entered for want of a plea. Judgment taken January 5, 1869, and execution levied upon the lands of defendant Gorthy. The defendant denies that the summons was ever served on him, and avers it was not till about the time when the execution was levied upon his land that he knew judgment had been obtained; that he then employed Mr. Strickland, of Saint John's, an attorney, to look after his interests. Strickland advised him that he could get his land released from the levy, but afterward said he could do nothing except to ask Congress for relief.

"Brown, Judge:

"I regret my inability to set aside this judgment, for it seems the action should never have been commenced. If I was satisfied that the summons was never served upon the defendant, I might treat the judgment as void, under the case of Thompson vs. Whitman, (18 Wallace, 457,) but it is asking too much for me to believe the unsupported affidavit of the defendant himself, made more than ten years after the summons is said to have been served, as against the return of the officer made at the time that he did actually serve it."

This bill was reported favorably in and passed the Senate during the Forty-sixth Congress, but failed to be reached in the House. On application from Senator Thurman, chairman of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, the Solicitor of the Treasury made a report to the Attorney-General, which, after reciting the facts in the case, closed as follows:

"In December, 1878, a motion was made by one of the defendants in the United States district court to set aside the judgment, on the ground that he was not served with process. Although the judge refused the motion because he was not satisfied the defendant had not been served, yet he regretted his inability to do so, because, in his judgment, the action on the recognizance should not have been commenced. From all the facts I am satisfied that this is a proper case for Congressional relief."

In the letter of the Attorney-General, dated January 31, 1880, to Senator Thurman, transmitting the said report of the Solicitor of the Treasury, he used the following language: "I concur in the view expressed by him in the last paragraph of his letter."

Gorthy and Green were at the time of the levy and sale and still are living on these lands, and have made valuable improvements thereon. They are honest, hard-working men, and these lands constitute their homes and their entire property. We think that the United States never had any cause of action against them, and it is unjust now to attempt to enforce the proceedings. As, however, the Solicitor of the Treasury in said report suggests that the taking of the title to this land by the Government operates to extinguish the debt, and therefore it would be proper that Gorthy and Green be required to pay all costs of court, we have concluded to recommend the bill to the House granting the relief sought, with the proviso that they pay said costs, and that it do pass.

Mr. McMILLIN. I think the report is entirely satisfactory, and I shall not object to the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SPAULDING moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ROBESON. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the morning hour for the call of committees for reports.

Mr. CRAPO. I move to dispense with the morning hour.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 74, noes 30.

So (two-thirds having voted in the affirmative) the morning hour was dispensed with.

CONTESTED ELECTION—COOK VS. CUTTS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House additional testimony in the case of John C. Cook vs. Madison E. Cutts, from the sixth district of Iowa; which was referred to the Committee on Elections.

CLAIMS ALLOWED.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a supplementary list of certain claims allowed by the accounting officers of the Treasury since January 14, 1882; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

FRED HENNINGER.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury relative to the appropriation made to Fred Henninger, on page 16 of private act No. 9, approved May 1, 1882; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, indefinite leave of absence was granted to Mr. McLANE from the 13th instant, on account of sickness.

EXTENSION OF NATIONAL-BANK CHARTERS.

Mr. CRAPO. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the further consideration of the special order, the bill (H. R. No. 4167) to enable national banking associations to extend their corporate existence. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FLOWER] is entitled to the floor, and has forty-five minutes of his hour remaining.

Mr. FLOWER. I yield the remainder of my time to my colleague, [Mr. HEWITT.]

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I must ask the indulgence of the House for the condition in which I find my voice this morning. I shall not attempt to talk in any higher than a conversational tone, which I am aware cannot be heard on the other side of the House; and I regret it, for I give notice now that I shall have occasion in the course of my remarks to refer to my old friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] and also to the distinguished gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON.]

When John Quincy Adams, after having served as President of the United States, was returned to this House, where he crowned with honor a career of political service which has placed him in the front rank of American statesmen, he made an entry in his diary to the following effect: "I have sold my stock in the Bank of the United States lest it might be supposed that my action in the House might be influenced by the ownership of bank property." With this illustrious example before me, I think it not improper to say that I am the owner of no stock in any national bank; that I have never been the owner of such stock, except about a thousand dollars' worth which I once held in trust for a ward. It was not a personal interest. I have never borrowed a dollar from a national bank, and have only used them for the deposit of money and the collection of exchanges.

I am therefore probably as free from any complication with and any obligation to national banks, not only as any man on this floor but as any man in this country. What I shall say, therefore, will not be in the interest of banks. It will be as the representative of a district in which I think there is not located a single national bank. For, although I represent a very large district in the city of New York, it happens to be in that part of the city where people do not operate banks, but where they work with their hands. It is in the interest of those who work with their hands and those that give employment to those who so work that I propose to speak to-day. I suppose there is no man at this day who claims or believes that the country can get along without banks. They are one of the tools of commerce, one of the machines by which the business of the country is carried on. They are the growth of experience, and they have assumed their present shape and form as the result of an experience which has finally culminated in giving to this country by the universal consent of economists and writers upon financial subjects the best banking system that the world has ever seen. I do not think it is perfect. I do not say that at some other time we may not devise a better system; but it is the best yet devised by the ingenuity of man.

As we are to have banks, the only question is whether they shall be national banks or State banks. We have tried the State banks. They were a failure. I think there is no one who can go back as far as I can in the history of finance in this country, and no one of the younger generation who has studied the history of the past, who would consent on any terms whatever to go back to the State banking system even when the most perfect, as in the State of New York, where we had the safety-fund system, which provided absolute security for the circulation.

Now, if we would not go back to the State banks and must have banks, we are driven to the conclusion they must be national banks. In regard to these national banks I think there is no controversy at this day except on one point. Even my friend from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] in the substitute he has offered recognizes the propriety of their continuance as banks of discount and deposit. I think that my other friend from Missouri [Judge BUCKNER] who so long served at the head of the Committee on Banking and Currency makes no criticism on these institutions as banks of discount and deposit. It is only, therefore, on the question of circulation that there is any criticism to be made upon the banks. Now, the circulating medium is in finance what the life-blood is to the human body. We must keep it in the best possible condition or disease is sure to occur and ruin and death, industrial death, to follow.

The system which we have is a national one. All circulating notes are now issued by the direct action of the Government, whether they be its own notes or the notes apportioned to national banks on certain conditions. The currency is entirely supplied by the Government. It is at par everywhere, and no doubt exists in the mind of any human being, when he gets one of these bills, whether it be a Government note or a national-bank note, that he can get for it in coin one hundred cents on the dollar.

The basis is an issue of Government legal-tender notes. That basis, of $346,000,000 in round numbers, corresponds to what is known in the Bank of England as "the rest." There it is £15,000,000, or about $75,000,000, while here it is $346,000,000. The disparity is great, but nevertheless, in view of the great extent of this country, in view of the fact that paper money is much more extensively employed in this country than it is in England or in continental Europe, it seems in practice that the amount of $346,000,000 is a perfectly safe amount, which we may count upon as staying in circulation, even in the most disastrous times or adverse condition of business, provided a proper redemption fund is maintained in coin.

I think that this fact might be made a certainty, if the whole $346,000,000 of Government notes were issued in bills of small denominations, and the banks restricted to the issue of bills of the denominations of $10 and over. The reason is obvious. Small bills are rarely returned for redemption. And the amount of these small bills, now about $200,000,000, I am satisfied might be increased to $346,000,000, and they would rarely under any circumstances whatever be presented to the Treasury for redemption. Let me be understood. I recognize facts as I find them. I would never by vote or act authorize or contribute to the issue of these legal-tender notes. I should be very glad if they could be retired. I do not think that this Government was created for the purpose of supplying circulation; on the contrary, I think the fathers and founders of the Constitution intended to prohibit the exercise of any such power.

I agree with Hamilton, whose superior as a financier has never lived, when he says, "to emit an unfounded paper as the sign of value ought not to continue a formal part of the Constitution," (referring to the new Constitution as contrasted with the articles of confederation,) "nor ever hereafter to be employed; being in its nature pregnant with abuses, and liable to be made the engine of imposition and fraud; holding out temptations equally pernicious to the integrity of government, and to the morals of the people." (Hamilton's works, II, 271.)

But we have Government paper money, and it now works well in practice. I know that principle is a good thing, but when you have a condition of things which works well it is dangerous to disturb it. And as I would by no act of mine have contributed to the issue of these legal-tender notes, so now, in view of the present condition of the country, and its adaptation to this system, by no act of mine will I contribute, as at present advised, to their immediate retirement.

I am willing, no matter what the coming decision of the Supreme Court may be as to the legal-tender clause, that the $346,000,000 of Government notes now outstanding shall remain as a currency for the country until some better and more economical system shall be devised by the experience, not of Congress, but of men engaged in business.

How is the balance of the circulating medium provided? I assume that the $346,000,000 of Government notes will never come in for redemption. The balance is now provided by the national banks. The amount fluctuates from day to day. I do not mean the amount which has been delivered by the Government to the banks, but the amount which the public receives and takes from the banks, over and above what the banks themselves hold as a part of their reserve, or as their daily balances.

Now, somebody must provide for the redemption of these notes, and for their issue in accordance with the demands of business. Any banking system to be good, or, I should rather say, any circulating medium to be good, must have two elements. First, it must be surely redeemable in coin on demand; and, secondly, it must be issued daily in amounts sufficient to meet the legitimate requirements of business. That is precisely the condition we have now. The banks are ready, with adequate security, to wit, the security of the Government debt, to redeem every note that is presented. And, secondly, they are in condition, either out of the reserves which they have on hand, or out of the new bills which they can get for the deposit of additional Government bonds, to provide for whatever amount of currency the requirements of business may make necessary. And it is not conceivable that so far as business is concerned there should be a better state of things than this.

But I am met by the statement that this circulation is a source of profit; that the creation of circulation is a sovereign right, and that the profit belongs to the State, to the Government, to the people. Therefore if there be any profit in this circulation it ought to be taken by the Government, and the banks are not entitled to any of it.

Now, if the Government assumes this duty, if it has any such right, which I deny, if it assumes to itself this duty it must also assume the duty of redemption and of the expansion and contraction of the currency to meet the fluctuating demands of business. Now, I think I speak only the lesson of history when I say that redemption depending upon Congressional action would be a delusion and a snare.

I think I may go further and say that not only would there be no certainty of redemption but it is absolutely certain that there would come a time when in the absence of Congressional action, or by Congressional action, redemption would be made impossible. Therefore the first element of a sound circulation is absent, that is, if made dependent upon action of Congress.

Secondly, it would be impossible for Congress by any earthly contrivance to meet the demands which are made daily for a change in the amounts of the currency. We are not always in session; and when we are in session gentlemen about me know how exceedingly difficult it is to secure action upon any question, and much more upon questions so much in doubt and controversy as the currency question is. Therefore there could be no automatic action of expansion and contraction in the currency (which is the fundamental element in a good circulating medium) by the legislation of this body.

I shall be told that it would be possible to relieve Congress of this duty, and transfer it to a board who should decide from day to day, and from week to week, how the currency should be issued, and the methods by which it should be got into circulation. My answer to that is, that we have had during the refunding operations and since the war an experience of the dangers of confiding power over the currency to public officers, however capable and however honest. The fact is that to put the control of the currency into individual hands, is to put the whole property of the country at the mercy of the men who control the currency. The power is too great not only for human knowledge but for human character. It is impossible to find any one man, or any half dozen men who can comprehend the wants and business interests of a country like ours; and it is impossible to find men who can separate themselves absolutely from the interests which they themselves may hold, or which may be represented by their friends.

I have no personal knowledge of the alleged scandals in regard to refunding; I do not propose here to make any charges; but this I say, it is notorious that in the refunding operation particular banks, representing particular individuals, had practically a monopoly of that vast transaction, and that one bank in my own State cleared its capital stock (which, if I am correctly informed, is $300,000) five times over in the course of the refunding operations in two years.

A MEMBER. Five hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Well, if the capital stock was $500,000, it cleared that stock three times over; but if I should say five times I would be still within safe bounds as to their profits on the whole refunding transactions. That may have been all legitimate. The refunding operation was the grandest financial operation that has ever been made in the history of man.

But, sir, for one, I do not want what little I have laboriously gotten together to be placed at the mercy of any man. I should like to be able to manage my own property, and to keep or give in my own way what I have accumulated. I do not want a deus ex machina to administer the business of this country. There could be but one result of such a system, utter and absolute ruin. I therefore dismiss as impracticable, the idea that any board composed of men can undertake this task which is beyond the reach of human capacity.

Having thus disposed of the proposition that Congress can regulate the currency or that any officials appointed by Congress can do it, I come back to the fact that currency we must have, and that this currency will not be issued unless it be made profitable to the parties who issue it. I shall come in a few moments to the question of profits; but I say here that banks are not benevolent institutions. They are not governmental agencies except in a very narrow sense. They are organizations of men with capital for the purpose of carrying on a business which is not only lawful, but absolutely necessary to the community. They are not going to conduct this business without profit; it ought not to be asked of them. But if the profits should ever become excessive, the taxing power resides in Congress. There is no difficulty at all in regulating the business and taking to the Government as we now do such portions of these profits as Congress may think belong legitimately to the Treasury.

But more than that; when a business is free, and when there is no monopoly at all, excessive profits cannot long endure. Only show me that a bank is able to make more than I can make in my iron business, and if I can get rid of some prejudices that I have against banks—which are the result of my early training, and which I regret—I should take my capital out of the iron business and put it in banks. There is no possibility that the profits of these institutions can for any considerable period of time, except in very abnormal circumstances, exceed those of legitimate business in other directions. The fact is that these banks, while they have been highly profitable at times, made their money very largely out of the refunding operation. That operation is done and ended; it will not be renewed in our day. On the contrary we should pay off the existing national debt, and never as I hope in our time have occasion to create another.

So that on the question of what the profits of these banks may be, it seems to me it must be conceded that as we must have agencies, and the banks are acceptable agencies to the business of the country, and as we can regulate their profits by law, and as they are still better regulated by free competition, nobody who is willing to get rid of his prejudices can make any fair criticism against the continuance of the national banking system.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Will it interrupt my friend——

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I am afraid it will interrupt me. I would be very willing to answer the gentleman——

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Then I will not disturb the gentleman.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I am always glad to answer any question, and particularly a question of the gentleman from Illinois. But I am suffering this morning, unhappily, in a way that makes it very desirable to me that I should reserve what strength I can for what I have to say. At the close of my remarks I will gladly answer any question of the gentleman.

Now, we have been told that, while the circulation of the national banks is at present adequately secured, there will very shortly come a time when Government bonds will be retired, and there will be no such security for this circulation.

What, then, are we to do in regard to the circulation of the country? There my friend from Missouri comes in and says give us Treasury notes in lieu of it. I have shown you, I think, conclusively that Treasury notes would not answer the valid purposes of money.

I have been asked on my side of the House to make some suggestions as to what course might be taken to provide a currency for this country that would be redeemable on demand and automatic in its issue. And let me say here that I want to confirm the statements of my colleague from New York, [Mr. FLOWER.] Before I make any suggestion as to how the circulation may be provided I want to confirm his statement. Something must be done with reference to this subject at once. The banks that will close up their business unless they take out new charters under the operation of existing law will in the present year withdraw a very considerable amount of money; $13,000,000 I think is the amount. But the called bonds of $42,000,000 will compel the withdrawal of a very much larger amount of the circulating medium, and in my judgment that withdrawal will take place unless this Congress takes immediate action.

The reason is that owing to the low rate of money all over the world it will not pay the banks to purchase such Government bonds as they can buy to replace the called bonds, and the result is they will take their money and retire the circulation.

A remedy was suggested by my colleague, which is the prompt passage of a refunding bill, so that these bonds may be replaced by the new 3 per cent. bonds which will be created by that refunding bill.

And I want to say to gentlemen on the other side of the House that the responsibility, the onus, in this business is on them. This side of the House in the last Congress, of which I had not the honor to be a member, did pass a refunding bill, which was vetoed.

The veto was a Republican measure. I do not propose to discuss it; I only want these gentlemen to remember when this trouble comes, as come it will unless they act, that the responsibility is with them and not with us. And if I wanted a party advantage at the expense of the welfare of the country I would say to them do nothing, and I would hold my tongue on this floor. But I want no party advantages at the expense of the welfare and prosperity of this country. If they fail to make it possible for the banks to replace the bonds which will be withdrawn, followed by a withdrawal of circulation, then there will be a tide of indignation sweeping over this country which will carry their majority away, and put some other party in power which is ready to meet the necessities of the adverse condition in which the country will find itself. But such advantages are not those which patriots or statesmen seek to gain.

Let me remind gentlemen of the House of what happened by the withdrawal of so small an amount as eighteen millions. When the refunding bill was passed the banks hastened, not by conspiracy or combination, as far as I know or believe, but hastened into a panic (which showed that bank officers are not wiser than other men) to get their bonds, and retire their circulation. That withdrawal of $18,000,000 brought this country to the very verge of bankruptcy and came near bringing on a panic as disastrous as that of 1857 or 1873.

Now, if $18,000,000 would create such a result, what is going to be the result of $42,000,000 plus $13,000,000 which we are in danger of seeing withdrawn in case no action looking to the refunding of the 3½ per cent. bonds is taken?

Therefore, without reference to party, let me urge both sides of the House to adopt some measure to prevent so great a calamity.

In the mean time what can we do? We can pass the bill under consideration allowing bank charters to be extended, with proper amendments. I quite agree in the amendment of my friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] not because I would have originally approved it, but because the experience to which I have referred shows it is necessary. Originally I would have said that any restriction on the free action of banks is unhealthy and dangerous, but when I find the banks themselves running like a pack of sheep into a panic, then I say let us by way of precaution, make it impossible for them to retire their circulation, without adequate notice to the public. And for that reason I trust my friend the chairman of the committee, whom I see sitting on my left, will accept the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania as a necessary safeguard against the danger of sudden contraction.

Now, by extending these charters we actually give no new rights to the banks. They may reorganize and are organizing all the time under the bank act, taking out new charters for twenty years. I would prefer to allow them to run on; first, to avoid the expense of reorganization, and secondly, to avoid the inconvenience of winding up their affairs and starting again; but more particularly to avoid the distribution of $128,000,000 of surplus profits which they hold on hand and which is the basis of business in this country to the extent at least of $1,000,000,000 per annum.

I will undertake to say that the withdrawal of $128,000,000 of bank capital would decrease the volume of business at least $1,000,000,000. I think it would be a fair estimate to say that $1 of bank capital loaned out produces in a year $10 of business; and even that, I think, would be a very small estimate.

Now, this renewal does not give any new privileges to the banks. We allow them to do what they have now a right to do in another form; but we gain the immense advantage of compelling them to retain the $128,000,000, which is not only the basis of business but an absolute guarantee to the people of their strength and solvency. That fund has been built up under the system of transferring at the expiration of every six months a portion of the profits of the banks to this reserve fund; and that fund will necessarily be distributed if you compel these banks to wind up and go into liquidation. It will be impossible not to produce disastrous results from such an operation.

Facilis descensus Averni,
Sed revocare gradum, superasque evadere ad auras,
Hic labor, hoc opus est.

It will be ten years before you can bring back the banking system to the condition of absolute protection to the bill-holders and depositors which it now has.

Now, having said this much, in view of the fact that the passage of the funding bill giving a couple of hundred millions of 3 per cent. bonds, which will not be redeemed until the $300,000,000 not so funded are taken out of the way, will give the needed time for preparation, I will make some suggestions as to what kind of a currency might be substituted when the stock of Government bonds shall be sensibly diminished. I make this suggestion for the benefit of my friends on the other side, who are now in the majority here, and also for the benefit of my friends on this side, who will be in a majority in the next Congress, when we shall have to dispose of the question.

Mr. BUCKNER. Would it disturb my friend to ask him a question?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I must request my friend not to interrupt me. I am making my speech absolutely without a note, and I am trying to keep the thread of the argument in my mind.

What would I propose? I propose that the national banking system under the law as it now stands shall not be changed in any respect whatever except one.

That relates to the circulation and to the security for the circulation. I would keep the supervision and the issuing of the money in the hands of the Government through the agency of the banks. I would provide for the reserve fund and for the redemption fund, and for the accumulation of the surplus profits. I would do all that as is done at present under the law, but I would no longer compel the banks to deposit Government bonds for the amount of the circulation issued to them.

What security would I substitute? First, the amount of notes that I would deliver to a bank would be 90 per cent. of its capital, and I would still continue to require that $50,000 of the capital of each of the national banks should be invested in Government bonds, and this for reasons which will be obvious to every gentleman present. There are no less than two thousand national banks. I believe the total number is about twenty-three hundred, but in round numbers we will say there are two thousand of them; and $50,000 of the capital of each invested in this manner would make a fund of $100,000,000 of Government bonds owned by the banks. There will be always in our day bonds enough to enable the banks to comply with this requirement. The Government has no longer any motive to make a market for its bonds. Formerly it had, and for that reason the lawmakers, in framing that portion of the law requiring the bonds to be held by the banks, intended to coerce the banks into buying the bonds. But the work of refunding is practically done. The Government has no further interest in the matter as far as making a market for its bonds is concerned. The method which I would suggest would require only one hundred millions of bonds to be held by the banks, and hereafter the Government credit can take care of itself, and needs no artificial support.

I would deliver to banks 90 per cent. in circulating notes on the amount of their capital. I would make the notes of the bank a first lien on the assets of the bank. Secondly, I would make the stockholders, as they now are, personally liable for 100 per cent. in addition to the capital of the bank, and make the notes of the bank a first lien upon this amount. Now, I have at least under this arrangement 200 per cent. behind the notes. Thirdly, I would compel the banks to put a redemption fund of 10 per cent. in coin into the hands of the Treasurer of the United States. Taking the present capital of the banks, $360,000,000, that would put $36,000,000 of coin as a redemption fund in the hands of the Treasurer. Lastly, I would make the banks as a whole guarantee the circulation of each individual bank. I would make the whole $360,000,000 of bank capital, with the right to call $360,000,000 more if necessary, a guarantee for the redemption of the notes.

Now, let us see what will happen. A bank breaks; its note is redeemable at the Treasury of the United States in coin without a moment's delay. There is the fund for it—$36,000,000. It is not conceivable that under any circumstances whatever you could have a demand for more than $2,000,000 or $3,000,000 at any one time; but there is $36,000,000 ready to protect the notes of any broken bank. Next, I would recoup the amount paid out for redemption of these notes by immediate assessment on the banks and require them to make it good; and when the bank is wound up and the lien for circulation is collected I would refund the money to the banks for the assessment they might have paid.

I submit to this House, I submit to these experienced gentlemen who are in the banking business—for I am not and have not been, and am not even a director of a bank—I submit to these gentlemen, and I see one of them before me [Mr. SMITH, of Illinois] whose speech I read with great satisfaction the other day—I submit whether it is conceivable that a circulation secured in that way would be irredeemable, or that there would be a particle of doubt about it from one end of the land to the other. But while it is so absolutely secure as to be bomb-proof and fire-proof it imposes no harder condition on the banks than does the present law, which requires the stockholders to be personally liable for an amount equal to the capital stock held by each.

This is a crude suggestion. I do not submit it here in the form of a bill nor in any very elaborate shape, because it is not part of my business here to do so. I am so placed in this House, that I have no connection whatever with any committee which concerns itself with the finance, or the commerce, or the revenue of the country. In submitting this suggestion, however, I would say it is not one which has been made without much reflection and some careful study. I am prepared to stake whatever reputation I may have for business capacity on the suggestion as one which is feasible, one which is easily executed, and one which will give security and stability not only to the currency but to the business of the country.

It has been objected by many of my friends that the profits of these banks are exceptional, and that something ought to be done to regulate the profits. I do not propose to spend much time in showing, as has been done by other gentlemen, what the profits of these banks are. But in the report of the Comptroller I find, on page 61, a statement of the profits of these banks from 1869 to 1881, and another table in which the profits of the last three years are tabulated. It turns out that the earnings of capital and surplus in 1879 were 5.5 per cent.; that in 1880 they were 7.9 per cent.; and in 1881, which was a year of extraordinary prosperity in this country, with very large banking transactions unparalleled in the history of the country, they made 9.2 per cent. That does not strike me, who have been in business a great many years, as an unreasonable rate of profit.

Mr. BLAND. If the gentleman will allow me I would ask him——

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I must decline to be interrupted by my friends, and I am willing to yield to interruptions by my opponents on the other side of the House.

Mr. BLAND. I wish to ask the gentleman——

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa.) Does the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I do not.

Mr. BLAND. I only wished to ask the gentleman whether he had taken into account the profits these banks made under Sherman's refunding operations.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. As the question has been put I will answer it by saying I have referred to the profits of refunding already fully and amply, and stated what they were, and that is enough. I have concealed nothing. I am not the advocate of the banks here.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I do not yield.

Mr. BLAND. Then do not answer the question at all.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. And I would say to the gentleman from Missouri that I would prefer that he should not ask questions which break up the continuity of my remarks. The gentleman can have his chance to reply.

I say that these profits are not to my mind unreasonable. They are the profits, however, of institutions which are protected by the legislation of the country. And it may be said, therefore, that they are exceptional from that point of view.

I propose now to compare these profits with those of other institutions which are protected by the legislation of the country; and I propose to take a single case as being much more easy to comprehend; and in order that the issue may be the better defined in the minds of gentlemen who are good enough to listen to me, I refer to the profits of those persons who are so fortunate as to be engaged in the manufacture of Bessemer steel rails, which is protected by a duty of $28 per ton on every ton of foreign steel rails which is brought into this country. I propose to show exactly what at least one of these Bessemer steel concerns has been able to make. There has been some controversy in this House on that subject. I did not introduce it. It was introduced in the remarks of my friend from Kentucky, [Mr. CARLISLE,] who said he had figured up that the profits had been 67 per cent. in a single year. That was followed by the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. DUNNELL,] who repeated the same figures, which I suppose he took from the statement of the gentleman from Kentucky. At that point, having some knowledge of this subject, I ventured a remark that I knew that dividends had been made to the extent of 50 per cent. in a year and that the profits had exceeded 67 per cent.; yes, that the undivided profits after paying this dividend exceeded 100 per cent. But my statement was promptly and absolutely denied by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY.]

Now, as an illustration of what can be made by business other than banking, and in comparison with it, I propose to give the facts in regard to which there shall be no controversy, because they are all matters of judicial decision, upon sworn testimony, which I have been able to procure. I see the Speaker with the hammer in his hand.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I had no idea I had taken up so much time.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I move that the gentleman be allowed to extend his remarks, at least until he gets through with this comparison.

Mr. HARDENBERGH. I am willing to yield to the gentleman twenty minutes of my time.

Mr. KELLEY. If the time of the gentleman is extended, I shall desire some time in response to him.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. How much shall the time of the gentleman be extended?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Without limit.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I thank the House, and I will not take up much more time. I have procured from the auditor's office of the State of Pennsylvania, and I hold the official document in my hand, a statement of the dividends paid by the Pennsylvania Steel Company, which I regard as the most reputable, not more reputable than the others, but at the very head of this business.

* And 5 per cent. stock.
† And 3 per cent. stock.
‡ Cash profit added to sinking fund, $30,000.
NOTE.—Report for 1882 not made yet; not due until November.

In 1874 the dividends paid by that company were 3 per cent. in cash and 5 per cent. in the stock. Remember that that was immediately after the panic of 1873, when all business was in a great state of depression, and the iron business, in which I was concerned, was losing money. It is in the testimony before the Committee on Ways and Means that the steel men reported that their business was in a very unsatisfactory if not in a disastrous condition. The testimony I hold in my hand, and gentlemen who desire to examine it will find it is a document styled Duty on Steel Rails, printed in 1880 by the Committee on Ways and Means, and embracing testimony taken before that committee.

In 1874 the dividends paid by the Pennsylvania Steel Company were 8 per cent. In 1875 they were 3 per cent. cash, 3 per cent. cash and 3 per cent. stock, making 9 per cent. in all. In 1876 they were 3 per cent. in cash and 3 per cent. cash, making 6 per cent. in all. In 1877 they were 6 per cent. cash. In 1878 they were 3½ per cent. cash, showing that at that date the reserved profits were nearly exhausted. In 1879 they were 9 per cent. and, as it is termed, "cash profits added to the sinking fund," $30,000, which, on a capital of about two millions of dollars, was 1½ per cent. more. In 1880 the dividends were 12 per cent., two of 6 per cent. each. In 1881 the quarterly dividends were 5 per cent., 6 per cent., 5 per cent., 6 per cent., making 22 per cent. in all, cash dividends.

Now, having made that dividend in 1881, what was the condition of the company? The evidence will be printed in full in the RECORD, and I will read it before I get through if any one shall dispute my statements. The company found itself with the sum of $3,286,423.51 on hand on the 31st of August, 1881; its capital being $2,000,000. The company had gone through an era of very bad times, in which it had made regular dividends and presumably divided all its profits. As a matter of fact, I think that the surplus in 1878, when the dividends fell to 3½ per cent. before the "boom" came, was very small. After making its dividend of 9 per cent. in 1879, when it carried a cash profit to the sinking fund of $30,000, and I presume exhausting the reserve fund, and after making a dividend of 12 per cent. in 1880 and 22 per cent. in 1881, it found itself with the sum of $3,286,423.51 undivided profits on hand.

Gentlemen will please to pause a moment and think how much $3,286,423.51 is on a capital of $2,000,000; a profit acquired in a single year, or at most in two years. Now, when they paid 22 per cent. dividend in 1881, they had paid all the dividends that they wanted to pay a State tax on. My friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. CURTIN] will tell you that the State of Pennsylvania imposes a tax on dividends, and the bigger the dividends of course the more the tax.

Now, this company having more than $3,000,000 surplus, did not care to pay taxes on more than 22 per cent. dividends. So they devised a plan to distribute this surplus in some other form than in the nominal shape of a dividend; and I will tell you how they sought to accomplish this difficult feat.

There were 20,000 shares of this stock; 6,000 belonging to the Pennsylvania Railroad Company. They proceeded to purchase from the Pennsylvania Railroad Company 5,000 shares of this stock and paid for it $265 a share. Now, if you will take the trouble to add the capital of the company, $2,000,000 to the surplus $3,286,423.51, making together just the amount of the capital plus the surplus, and divide that by 20,000 shares, you will find that they paid for that stock the full value as shown by the books. It was worth a great deal more, but that is what they paid.

Now, having bought these 5,000 shares, they issued a confidential circular to their shareholders, saying that they had done this thing and would sell this stock which had cost and was worth $265 a share, for $100 a share. In other words, they paid out in the purchase of these 5,000 shares of stock, $1,325,000, and they sold the stock to their shareholders for $500,000. By that means they distributed $825,000 of their surplus profits to their shareholders without calling it a dividend.

In other words, it was a sale by the Pennsylvania Railroad Company of its stock in the Pennsylvania Steel Company to the other shareholders of the Steel company for $265 a share, for which the stockholders paid $100 a share, and the Steel company paid out of its treasury $165 a share and made it a free gift to its stockholders without calling it a dividend.

The public would never have had any knowledge of this operation if it had not happened that the estate of John Edgar Thompson held 1,000 of these shares of the steel company. Thompson had been the president of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, and when he died he held 1,000 of these shares. The income of his estate was devised to his widow, and the question submitted to the court was whether this stock, costing $100 a share but worth $265 a share, should be added to the principal as a stock division, or be regarded as income and delivered to Mrs. Thompson.

The facts which I have stated are all recited by Judge Ashman in his opinion, which I hold in my hand, and which I shall print in full in the RECORD, and were all the result of sworn evidence, the accounting of the books. The judge decided that this purchase and sale of stock was merely a cover for a dividend; that it was a dividend of $825,000, and that Mrs. Thompson was entitled to her share of it as such. Now, I will either have this read for the edification of my friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] or I will print it in the RECORD, as he may prefer.

After this was all done and they had divided 22 per cent. in cash, in addition to this dividend of $165 a share, which of itself amounted to 55 per cent. on the unpurchased shares, making the dividend that year 77 per cent. instead of 67 per cent. as my friend from Kentucky [Mr. CARLISLE] figured it out, what do you suppose they had left undivided? After the purchase there remained of unexpended profits $2,461,423.51, with six months' profits to be ascertained and added. Now, I suppose those six months' profits were not less than half a million dollars; but I do not know how much they were; and I will not state anything that I do not know; but the unexpended profits, after the magnificent dividend I have mentioned, were $2,461,423.51—over 125 per cent. I will read what the auditing judge said:

> The auditing judge is of opinion that the 344 shares are income to which the life tenant is entitled, upon payment of the par value of $100 per share; and subject to such payment, they are awarded to her accordingly.

Now I am not going to be hard upon my friend from Pennsylvania, and the reason is this: he spoke of me very kindly at the outset of his remarks, and made some references to future political preferment which might be in store for me. I presume he really meant what he said; I do not suppose it was sarcasm; therefore I feel kindly toward him, and will impute his denial of my statements to what it unquestionably was—absolute ignorance of the facts.

If I were to make a misstatement in regard to the iron and steel business, thereby misleading the House, I would be culpable; it would be on my part an unpardonable offense, for I have been over thirty years in the iron and steel business, and I know or ought to know all about it. When I made that statement I knew what I was talking about absolutely, and when the gentleman from Pennsylvania contradicted me I knew that he did not know what he was talking about just as absolutely. [Laughter.] The truth is, these gentlemen who are in the habit of giving him facts and figures never confided to him these profits; he did not know the facts. They only come to him when they are in trouble, and never tell him anything of their prosperity. He is chief mourner in their afflictions, but is not allowed to partake of the "baked meats."

It was announced by the gentleman from Pennsylvania that I was to be "flayed alive" on this business.

Mr. KELLEY. Oh, no!

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I saw it in the New York Tribune, on the morning when the "flaying alive" was to be done, that I was about to be "flayed alive;" and I observed when the gentleman from Pennsylvania came into the Hall that the high priest was decorated with flowers, not the victim, as used to be the practice in older and more idolatrous times. [Laughter.]

When the gentleman contradicted my assertions on the profits of steel making I did not retaliate on him as I might have done with another question. He had said there was no anthracite coal in Wales, and that David Thomas had told him there was none. I produced David Thomas's letter, and published it in the RECORD in connection with the speech of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BRUMM,] that letter saying that Mr. Thomas had never told Judge KELLEY anything of the sort, and had never had any conversation with him on the subject of coal. The gentleman from Pennsylvania did not refer to that; but he picked up the handiest brick that was in his way, and flung it at the glass windows which he supposed I had somewhere concealed in my breast. When he flung the "Morey letter" at me, I could have flung David Thomas's letter at him, for I had it in my hand. But I refrained, as I did when the gentleman went further and accused me of paying for the printing and circulation of my own speeches—as if that were a crime! Well, I do pay for printing and circulating my own speeches. It is a crime, I have no doubt, in the gentleman's eyes, because he does not always do that. It is done for him by others. I have been for twenty years or so, one of the vice-presidents of the American Iron and Steel Association. As I knew they were spending money for circulating his speeches, I concluded I would write to find out "the demnition total." I wrote a letter to the secretary of the association, Mr. Swank, on Saturday last, asking him to tell me what they were doing about Judge KELLEY'S speeches; that they were very fine speeches, and I wanted to know just what the association did in reference to their circulation. The secretary promised, as will be seen, to write me fully, but he has not yet done so. He has sent me a telegram, and all I can do now to clear up this matter is to read that telegram:

> A year ago we distributed copies of Judge KELLEY'S speech on Hurd's free-trade resolutions. This was a strictly non-partisan speech—> and its distribution by this association was entirely proper. During the past few months we have also distributed another non partisan speech by Judge KELLEY, before the Brooklyn Revenue Reform Club, and an essay in the International Review—

The gentleman's speeches are always "non-partisan"—

To which my friend from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT] has given some attention, though I have not read it myself—> an essay in the International Review on "A Science Based on Assumptions."

Now, if there is any "science based on assumptions," I think the manner in which the gentleman from Pennsylvania dealt with the profits of the Bessemer Iron and Steel Company ought to be included in it. [Laughter.]

> The distribution of protective tariff literature has always been a regular part of the work of this office. Will send fuller information by mail.
> JAMES M. SWANK.

Perhaps the letter has been sent to my honorable friend from Pennsylvania, and I beg him to produce it if he has it.

Now, I ask, before I go one step further, whether I shall have read the decision of Judge Ashman, so everybody will be fully posted?

Several MEMBERS. Print it in the RECORD.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I ask the House to believe that every word I have said as to figures and as to the decision of the judge will be confirmed by the statement I have put in the RECORD. This copy is taken from the certified record of the court.

Judge KELLEY said the court had nothing to do with such questions—it was an orphan's court. The judge, I think, will be inclined to take refuge in it himself. [Laughter.] It shall go on the record.

[An extract from the adjudication.]

In the orphan's court for the county of Philadelphia. In re Estate of J. Edgar Thompson, deceased. January term, 1881. No. 310.

The remaining item was of 334 shares of the Pennsylvania Steel Company, costing $33,466.67. The testator owned at his death 1,000 shares of stock of this corporation, and they were appraised in the inventory of his estate at $70,000.

He died May 27, 1874, at a time of great commercial depression. After his death, with the revival of business, the profits of the company increased and its shares rose in value, until they reached in January, 1882, $200 above par. On December 13, 1881, the directors authorized the president of the company to negotiate for the purchase of 5,000 shares of the stock, which were held at the time by the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, and on January 27, 1882, the agreement effected by that officer was ratified by the board. Five thousand shares were accordingly transferred by the Pennsylvania Railroad Company for the price of $265 per share, which was duly paid.

The following stipulation formed part of the agreement to purchase: "It is understood that it is the intention of the Pennsylvania Steel Company immediately to offer to its stockholders to take their pro rata proportion of the 5,000 shares herein referred to at par, and that the Pennsylvania Railroad Company will take and pay for the shares that may be allotted to it accordingly." On the same day a communication marked "confidential" was prepared by the directors of the steel company and forwarded to each stockholder. This circular, a copy of which is appended, stated that the Pennsylvania Railroad Company had, ten years before, as a measure of relief to the steel company, purchased and paid for 6,000 shares of the capital stock of the latter corporation, and was now ready to sell the whole or a part of their investment. It then set out the purchase of 5,000 shares by the directors of the steel company and the offer by the directors to apportion those shares, pro rata and at par, among the holders of the remaining 15,000 shares of the company. The rate for fractional shares was fixed by the circular at $200 per share.

At the time of the purchase the undivided profits of the company amounted to $3,286,423.51, as ascertained by the last semi-annual settlement, on August 31, 1881, with those earned since that date. The net cost to the company of the purchase was $825,000, leaving a surplus of profits which amounted to $2,461,423.51.

The accountants availed themselves of the terms of the offer, and purchased at par 334 shares, representing the allotment to which the investment of the estate in the company's stock was entitled. A decision was asked upon the point whether the proceeds of their purchase were to be carried in the account as capital or income.

The task would be agreeable, if it were only practicable, to extract from the cases a principle of general application to which this class of questions could be referred and by which they could be philosophically answered; such a principle was supposed to have been found, in Minot vs. Paine, 99 Mass., 101, by ranking all cash dividends as income, and all stock dividends as capital. This rule has the merit of simplicity, but it has been repudiated in Pennsylvania as empirical, (Vinton's Appeal, 2 W. N. C., 246.) No single test seems to have been potent enough to determine the doubt in any single case, much less to serve as the governing principle for any group of cases. Hence in the same case a variety of propositions has been relied upon, the force of each of which if taken separately is weakened by the number of exceptions to which it is manifestly subject.

For instance, the badge of capital has been affixed to a distribution where the value of the stock or cash dividend was required to be added to the market price of the stock after the distribution, in order to equal the value of the stock as it stood immediately before the transaction. Yet this rule, it is believed, would be worthless if applied to a mining company whose mines were approaching a point beyond which they could not be worked with profit and every dividend upon whose stock was followed by a fresh decline in the value of the investment. There is, however, no necessity in the case in hand to search for any general principle, because there are present several circumstances which bring it directly within the control of prior decisions. There is, first, the fact which was effectually proved, that the distribution was of profits which had accrued after the death of the testator. Three months prior to his death the undivided profits of the company were $267,536.06. Five months prior to the distribution, and after deducting the intervening dividends, they amounted to $3,286,423.51. On this point Earp's Appeal (4 Cas., 374,) lays down as an axiom that the profits arising after the death of a testator are income, and Wiltbank's Appeal (14 P. F. S., 256) declares that they are distributed in the form of capital. There is, secondly, the fact that no new stock was issued, whose effect would have been to dilute the original stock, as in Moss's Appeal, (2 Nor., 246,) when 2,000 shares after the distribution were worth no more than 1,000 shares before. The company, having regained possession of 5,000 shares of its original stock, distributed them among its shareholders. There was, thirdly, the fact that this was not a formal division of profits as such; but the authorities emphatically declare that this circumstance is immaterial. The language of Moss's Appeal is: "Equity which disregards form and grasps the substance would award the thing distributed, whether stock or moneys, to whomsoever was entitled to the profits." Judge Lewis, in Earp's Appeal, in speaking of profits earned by stocks, says: "The managers might withhold the distribution of it for a time, for reasons beneficial to the interests of the parties entitled, but they could not by any form of procedure whatever deprive the owners of it, and give it to others not entitled. * * * Its character cannot be changed by the evidences given to secure it."

The intention of the direction of the steel company was patent; it was to distribute $825,000 of profits. Two methods were open to them; they could distribute that amount pro rata in money, or they could distribute it in stock, which they might buy for that purpose. No sane mind would bewilder itself by attempting to show that a distribution in money would not be a distribution of income. But suppose that in adopting the second method the directors bought and distributed the stock of another corporation, or the loan of the Government, would the fact that the dividend was made in these evidences of indebtedness and not in cash convert the dividend into cash? And is the case varied because instead of buying Government stock they bought and divided the stock of their own corporation? But they did even less than this, they divided among the shareholders only the actual products of the stock so purchased, reserving for the treasury of the company the par value of each share.

Some expressions in Biddle's Appeal (2 W. N. C., 244) might possibly be tortured to favor the theory that the option in this case to subscribe for the allotted stock was a mere option to change the form of investment the exercise or sale of which could not convert the capital into income. It was there said that "whatever value beyond par the stock then had, by reason of the large surplus fund of the company or otherwise, attached to the stock and formed part of the principal;" and it was held that the proceeds of sale of the option belonged to the capital of the estate. But the language quoted referred to the allotment of a new issue of stock whereby the capital had been increased in the sum of $1,000,000. It would not only be inapplicable, but untrue if employed in the present case. The large surplus of the steel company did not attach to the stock of those shareholders only, among whom distribution was made; it attached just as fully to the stock which was divided.

In actual figures the shares purchased from the Pennsylvania Railroad had earned five-seventeenths of the profits, and hence to that proportion of the profits the remaining shares could lay no claim. It was strenuously urged at the audit that the stock of the steel company declined in value immediately after the distribution had been effected. Little weight, however, was given to that circumstance in Biddle's Appeal, in reaching the distinction between capital and income. But the actual decrease in value was trifling, and no greater perhaps than usually happens when stocks are quoted with dividends off. The price, $265 per share paid to the Pennsylvania Railroad Company in January, 1882, may be fairly taken to represent the market value of the securities at that time. On February 2, 1882, eight shares sold at $250; on February 3, 1882, one share sold at $275, and from February 14 to March 22, 1882, seventy-nine shares sold at an average of $260, and no other sales were reported. After the purchase there remained of unexpended profits $2,461,423.51, with six months' profits to be ascertained and added, a sum which it was testified was ample for all possible needs of the company and which would permit of its usual semi-annual dividend.

The auditing judge is of opinion that the three hundred and thirty-four shares are income, to which the life tenant is entitled upon payment of the par value of $100 per share; and, subject to such payment, they are awarded to her accordingly.

Filed April 26, 1882. Ashman, J.

Mr. CRAPO. I dislike to make any ungracious objection, but I understood the gentleman's time was extended out of the time of the gentleman from New Jersey. [Cries of "No!"]

Mr. FLOWER. I yielded to my colleague the forty-five minutes remaining of my hour, and his time was then extended by the House indefinitely.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I will not occupy ten minutes longer.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. The time of other gentlemen was extended just as the time of the gentleman from New York was extended, and I hope he will be permitted to proceed without further interruption.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from New York was indefinitely extended.

Mr. HOUSE. That is so.

Mr. CRAPO. It is the general desire that debate shall be terminated in a reasonable time on the pending bill, and I am asked by members on both sides of the House to insist that gentlemen shall confine themselves within the hour.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I will finish in a few minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York will proceed.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Now I have said that I feel very indulgent toward the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] and that I impute to him no intention of having any desire to deceive the House.

The next day, twenty-four hours having elapsed, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] took the floor. Judge KELLEY had already summed up the debate, but by a kind of double-barrel shot-gun arrangement of which I was to be the victim, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] had the closing hour. And he proceeded to use the most of it in answer to this very allegation of mine, that a dividend had been made exceeding 50 per cent. I was not present when the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] delivered his speech. It was not his fault; I was so ill I was absolutely compelled to lie down in the lobby. But if I had been present, it would have made no difference; he had the closing hour after the previous question, and I could have had no chance of reply. I will do him the justice to believe if I were present and desired to interrupt him he would have graciously accorded me permission to do so; but I have awaited his return from New York before referring to this matter. That gentleman had twenty-four hours' notice after reading the slip here from the Philadelphia Times, which I gave as a brief authority for my statement. The gentleman from Iowa sent for that slip. It was furnished to him, and appears copied in his speech. He states that he telegraphed, or caused a friend to telegraph, to Philadelphia for the information and got a reply, which he quotes in his speech. I will do him the justice to believe that he was deceived by his correspondent, or the gentleman who sent the telegram, because it is inconceivable, if he had the information I have now furnished to this House, he would have so misstated the facts. After quoting the slip he then goes on to say:

Then he went on to speak of a 50 per cent. dividend. No such dividend appears in this article at all. It was a simple award of a property that had been acquired in some way by the estate of Thompson.

I have explained the way.

And thus we find the gentleman from New York molding, with that thing in his hand, a newspaper slip into "evidence" that there had been a 50 per cent. dividend at the steel works without any statement of the amount of capital stock, or the evidence that even a dividend had ever been declared by the steel works.

I trust I have supplied the omission now to the gentleman from Iowa: capital stock, $2,000,000; dividend one year, 77 per cent., with a surplus of 125 per cent. and with six months' undivided surplus in addition. [Laughter.]

Not content with that, a gentleman who understood the condition of facts to be different, telegraphed, and received this reply: that it was "a distribution of stock, but not a dividend; a privilege of stockholders, of which Thompson's estate was one, to subscribe for a certain percentage of their stock holdings at par, which stock was purchased from large stockholders at a premium."

That is the best specimen I have seen of a suppressio veri, suggestio falsi.

It is literally and absolutely true, and I will relieve the gentleman from Iowa to that extent, but yet it conceals the fact, which must be known to this correspondent, that the judge decided it was a dividend and awarded it to the widow on the ground it was a dividend. In other words, it was an attempt to cover up a dividend, but, as it turns out, unsuccessfully, for when adjudicated it was decided to be a dividend.

I have no doubt the officers of the State of Pennsylvania will do their duty and collect their tax on it. In the memorandum they furnish to me they say the tax for 1882 has not yet been collected. I presume that dividend, judicially decided to be a distribution of profits, will appear among them when it is collected.

And now the gentleman from Iowa concludes—

Now, sir, when such gentlemen—

I do not know the exact meaning of "such" as used in this connection; possibly the gentleman meant persons engaged in such business as mine, the iron business, and who know what these profits are from their own experience; and I will say to the gentleman from Iowa that I do know of my own knowledge something of this matter, for I am one of those who have a practical familiarity with the subject, and I am the owner of stock in steel works, but I did not choose to refer to my own case because I felt some natural delicacy on the subject which "such" persons sometimes show. But he concludes:

When such gentlemen claim that they can revise the tariff "in thirty days," and when they have no more respect for facts than to assert deliberately in this House, without a scintilla of proof, a given instance of large yearly profits, the people of this country are justified in asking us to go out of this House and find some other means for ascertaining the facts as they are.

If the gentleman meant to go outside of the Ways and Means Committee I would have been entirely willing. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, the gentleman from Iowa and I have served together before. The relations between us have never been, so far as I know, certainly so far as I am concerned, other than friendly. I submit to him as a gentleman that he now retract before this House and the country every word of that concluding sentence where he charges me with having most deliberately falsified a statement "without a scintilla of proof," when I stand here to-day and produce the proof, which can neither be gainsaid nor refuted. I am willing to accord to him the excuse that he was deceived by some one; but the evidence is now submitted to him, and the gentleman owes it to himself, to me, and to the country to withdraw every word of that sentence which I have quoted. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. KELLEY rose.

Mr. BUCKNER. I believe I am entitled to the floor.

Mr. KELLEY. I ask the privilege of being heard in reply to the gentleman from New York for a few minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman from Pennsylvania rise.

Mr. KELLEY. I take the floor for the purpose of responding to personal allusions to myself, which involve to some extent a question of my veracity.

Mr. KASSON. I move that the gentleman from Pennsylvania be allowed to respond to the remarks of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. KELLEY. I hope the privilege will be accorded me.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask the House to yield the same privilege to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. ANDERSON. I hope there will be no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

There was no objection.

Mr. ANDERSON. That also includes the same privilege to the gentleman from Iowa?

Several MEMBERS. There is no objection.

Mr. KELLEY. I am very glad to know, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from New York has come to a realizing sense of the annoyance inflicted by questions that break the continuity of a speaker's thought. I wish he had done so before I took the floor on Friday a week ago. My remarks would have been less of a wrangle than they are as they appear in the RECORD. But I do not think he prevented me from saying what I wanted to say, nor that he succeeded in so confusing me that I said anything that I have occasion to regret or qualify. I said that I knew no Bessemer steel company had made profits amounting to 67 or 70 per cent. in 1880. I said more, that the paragraph the gentleman insisted on injecting into my speech had no relevancy to any question as to the earnings or dividends of Bessemer rail companies. That it was a decision by our orphans' court as to the distribution of the estate of a testator; and that is precisely what it was. The paper now produced by the gentleman, and which is to be printed in the RECORD, may show how the part of the estate to be distributed had arisen, but there was nothing, absolutely nothing, in the paragraph the gentleman so boisterously persisted in injecting into my remarks to show that it had the most remote reference to the profits of a Bessemer steel company.

I will not dispute the distribution of stock of the Pennsylvania Steel Company as and on the terms the gentleman has just stated; and yet I say that no Bessemer steel company made 67 per cent. profit in 1881, the year of which the gentleman challenged me to speak; and he shall be the witness to prove the truth of my assertion as a less wealthy man than he could not be. In the course of his speech he told us that for six successive years he had lost $100,000 a year by keeping his iron works in operation, but that in the seventh year by reason of a boom in the iron market he had far more than retrieved his losses. In this his experience was identical with that of the strongest and most favored of the Bessemer companies. They were able to do as he did, and there was as far as I know but one (and I used the word companies because there might possibly have been a second) that was able to go on, producing and taking advantage of the low rates of wages and prices of raw materials which prevailed during the depression to accumulate stock for the time when business should revive. They went on as he did, nominally losing money and were certainly unable to pay dividends—[Mr. HEWITT, of New York, rose.] I hope the gentleman from New York will not disturb the continuity of my thought.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Certainly not.

Mr. KELLEY. On page 15 of the RECORD containing my remarks will be found a portion of Mr. Swank's letter, in which are set forth some of the losses of American Bessemer steel manufacturers during the period referred to, and by reference to his statement I find that the company which I supposed might have been equally fortunate, the Cambria Iron Company, was compelled in 1874 to create a bonded debt of $1,000,000, and in 1877 to issue additional bonds to the amount of $278,000.

The company to which the gentleman refers is unquestionably the most successful of the Bessemer steel companies. The Cambria Iron Company, which employs over eight thousand men in steady employment, is probably the next; and to keep its thousands of hands employed when there was no market for its products in the years 1874 and 1877, inclusive, it issued $1,278,000 by the issue of bonds, and it was by this display of courage and enterprise that it was able, as was the Pennsylvania Company, to pile up stock, as did the gentleman at his iron-works on tide-water, to meet the demand that must come when the general business of the world should revive, as it must some day.

It came, sir, soon and violently enough to surprise the gentleman from New York and the holders of stock and managers of the Bessemer companies. So sudden and violent was the revival that it is spoken of as the boom. We could neither make nor buy iron to supply our immediate wants. We imported everything in the shape of iron that we could purchase. I had an account from an intelligent inspector of customs of one cargo of scrap-iron largely made up of hob-nails, round-headed iron hob-nails, which workmen in English iron, steel, and glass works wear when going over the fiery pavements of their workshops. Everything that could be collected was welcomed to meet the great demand for iron and steel. Then the Bessemer companies, as the gentleman told us he had, in the seventh year recovered their losses and in one year divided the profits of seven years. That is the whole story; and by this narration of facts, which are consistent with the gentleman's own experience, is the story of annual profits of from 67 to 70 per cent. exploded.

Sir, there is no analogy between the Morey letter and the letter of Mr. David Thomas. The gentleman certified in writing and in print to the genuineness of the Morey letter, and down to a day when he seemed to be the only man in the country who believed it he went upon the stump and told his auditors that his late associate, a friend with whom he had corresponded under peculiar circumstances, had written that letter, and that he knew it to be genuine by his familiarity with the writer and the writing.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I distinctly stated he did not write the letter; but that he signed it.

Mr. KELLEY. Asserting that it was his signature, you made the letter his; for you were old enough to know that what a man does by another he himself does, and that if he signed it it was his letter.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Certainly; I believed it genuine.

Mr. KELLEY. Please do not disturb the continuity of my thought. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. It was not the gentleman from Pennsylvania to whom I refused to yield. It was to gentlemen on this side of the House.

Mr. KELLEY. Now, as to David Thomas. I am not surprised that a gentleman may have forgotten a casual conversation; but I did have a conversation with David Thomas in which we spoke of the anthracite coal of Wales; and he did tell me that it was his experiment in Wales with her coal which enabled him to introduce the application of our anthracite to the manufacture of iron in Pennsylvania. But he also said that the Welsh coal was not pure anthracite; and, to borrow a phrase used by the gentleman, in the discussion on Friday week I in the haste of debate—mind my remarks were not in print—omitted the word "pure" and said there was no anthracite.

The question between Mr. Thomas and me is not one of veracity, but of memory. I affirm that he made a statement which impressed itself upon my memory. He does not seem to remember the incident. I do not mean to impugn the veracity of Mr. Thomas, but I say that those who are in the habit of weighing testimony will conclude that it is more likely his listener should remember so striking a fact than that he would, years afterward, remember a casual conversation which occurred in the freedom of social intercourse.

I wish to say to the gentleman from New York that I do not challenge his right to pay for the publication of his speech, and that I alluded to the subject only in response to the gentleman.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Oh, no; I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman said—well, let us look at the RECORD, and see what was said.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Yes; that is right.

Mr. KELLEY. Let the RECORD speak. There is the colloquy. I said:

I hope the error has been corrected in the 250,000 copies of the gentleman's speech he has caused to be printed for circulation by the Democratic campaign committee.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Yes; you flung it at me.

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman from New York said:

There are no copies being circulated through the Democratic campaign committee.

Proceeding, he said:

The number folded, I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, are those for which application has been made to me personally or by letter, and I paid that portion of the expenses myself and suppose that I shall also pay for the folding.

To which I responded:

I have heard that the gentleman paid for them most liberally.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Very well; that is as I stated it.

Mr. KELLEY. I raised no question as to the payment for the copies of his speech by the gentleman.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Nor I with you.

Mr. KELLEY. You said you supposed you would also pay for folding them; I would like to see the receipt given you when you make this payment.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I have had to pay for the folding of over 30,000 copies on account of bad management under the Republican administration; and other gentlemen on this side of the House have had to do the same thing.

Mr. KELLEY. Pray do not disturb the continuity of my thought. [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, I say without reserve that I had a right to infer from the gentleman's own speech, as well as from information in my possession, that he did not know what he was talking about when he spoke of the profits of Bessemer rail companies. He says the capital is twenty millions; I say it is more than one hundred millions.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. The gentleman will allow me to say——

Mr. KELLEY. Do not disturb the continuity of my thought; the question between the gentleman and me will be settled as time flows on. Other portions of his speech show that the gentleman from New York had not investigated the questions he discussed. He had prepared in the form of resolutions instructions for the Committee on Ways and Means under which it was to frame a tariff bill; and had prepared those instructions, as his resolutions and speech show, in utter obliviousness to the fact that we have a system of internal taxes and other sources of revenue besides customs duties. He proposed in his carefully-drawn resolution of instructions, which was the basis of his speech, that alcohol for use in manufactures shall be put on the free list.

Weeks afterward, when his attention had been called to the fact that we impose an onerous internal tax on alcohol, he said that his resolution of instructions was very crudely expressed, and that his purpose had been to remove the internal-revenue tax from alcohol used in manufactures. How did the gentleman propose to modify the internal-tax law by instructing the Committee on Ways and Means to report a provision for free alcohol in a tariff bill?

I do not rest my allegation that his resolution and speech were prepared in utter obliviousness to the fact that we derive any part of our revenue from internal taxes or miscellaneous sources on this proposition alone. The gentleman shall prove the case himself. He proposed to put alcohol on the free list, though by the internal tax the farmer must pay 90 cents tax before he can put on the market a peck of corn advanced in manufacture but one stage. The minimum tax is $3.60 on every bushel of corn manufactured into alcohol.

On page 17 of the gentleman's pamphlet speech I find this subhead: "Beneficent effect of reducing taxation." Under this head he says:

> The existing tariff was enacted as a war measure, intended to raise revenue at any cost. It succeeded in its purpose. To-day it produces $150,000,000 annually more than is needed for the national expenditure.

Now, let us consider these three lines of the gentleman's speech. Does the tariff produce $150,000,000 annually more than is needed for the national expenditure? Did Madison introduce a war measure when, on the third day of the first session of the first Congress, he introduced a tariff bill? From the time that bill (some of the provisions of which are embodied in the existing statutes) passed into law to the present there has never been a day on which we have not had a tariff?

Was the Morrill tariff bill a war measure? It was enacted nearly a year before the war began, and is the basis of the present tariff law. Was the wool and woolen tariff of 1867 a war measure? All these questions must be answered in the negative. The tariff is an original and continuous part of our revenue system. Apart from it we have special war taxes.

To pay the debt incurred by the Revolutionary war internal taxes were resorted to, and they were abolished under the lead of Jefferson as soon as that debt was in a shape that made it controllable with the ordinary sources of revenue. Again, we enacted as a war measure internal taxes to meet the expenditures of the war of 1812, and they were repealed at the end of four years.

A third time we enacted a war measure when we imposed the present internal taxes. And the gentleman, when he uttered the words I have quoted, did not know that the internal-tax system was in force or he meant to delude the 250,000 readers to whom his speech was to be sent.

I desire to consume as little time as possible; but I must pause to vindicate the patriotism of the iron and steel associations. In the course of my remarks the other day I referred to the fact that the Cobden Club of England had aggressively entered our last Presidential and Congressional campaign and had distributed its British-made books, published by and under the stamp of the club, in every Congressional district in the country.

Mr. SPRINGER. There were none in my district.

Mr. KELLEY. Well, they knew you were all right for their purposes, and therefore did not need to be deceived by the letter to farmers of Augustus Mongredieu. No copies were therefore sent to you personally.

Mr. SPRINGER. You will except my district.

Mr. KELLEY. No; you are not a district, you have at least 180,000 constituents.

Mr. SPRINGER. They were not sent into my district.

Mr. KELLEY. You can only speak for yourself. I know they were, for they were sent into every district in the country.

Mr. SPRINGER. I did not find any in mine.

Mr. KELLEY. Among the documents circulated by the Cobden Club in that campaign was a letter to the American farmer by Augustus Mongredieu, which I characterized the other day as so replete with falsehoods that I said if gentlemen would read it and should discover a single sentence which expressed an unqualified truth, I was sure they would attribute the circumstance to accident.

To meet this audacious attempt to control our elections we had no organization. The American Iron and Steel Association determined to enter the campaign against our foreign invader, the Cobden Club. In the preliminary statement accompanying his next annual report, which was made July 30, 1881, James M. Swank, the secretary of the association, said in this connection what I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

> During the Presidential and Congressional campaign of last year the Cobden Club of England threw off all disguise and sought directly to influence the free expression of the popular will in many States by circulating large quantities of English printed books and pamphlets which outrageously misrepresented the effects of our protective policy and falsely alleged that this country would be more prosperous under the British policy of free trade. This association promptly undertook the work of counteracting this movement of the Cobden Club, and a series of protective-tariff tracts, embracing over half a million copies, was printed and circulated in the wake of the free-trade publications. The result need not be dwelt upon, except to say that it completely vindicated the policy of maintaining in this country a strong organization that should be capable of meeting and defeating any similar assault upon American industries. The safety of the people from foreign dictation in their domestic affairs should be for it in such an emergency the supreme law. In this spirit, and in no other spirit, did this association aid in rebuking the Cobden Club for its hostile attempt to control our elections for the benefit of English manufacturers.
> This leads me to remark further that there exists to-day in this country a widespread and very gratifying demand for protective-tariff literature. The old standards of authority on protection are either out of print or are not wholly suited to the present aspects of the subject, and new and fresh treatises are urgently needed, some of which should be elementary in their character. It is greatly to be regretted that there is an actual scarcity of really valuable books that are adapted to the wants of that large class of our fellow-citizens who have not heretofore given much attention to the merits of the protective policy, but who wish now to become familiar with them. This class, which includes the students at our colleges and universities and the young farmers of the great West, demands books that shall deal not only with principles but also with results. What has protection done for this country, and what does it propose to do, are questions that it wants to see answered. It is a shame that the country is almost without a literature that would enable the students at our higher schools of learning to meet and refute the sophistries and the flagrant falsehoods of their free-trade teachers of alleged political economy. It is a shame that, for want of suitable books of reference, even one Western farmer should be deluded into the belief that the policy which proposes to establish a woolen factory, or an iron-rolling mill, or a manufactory of any kind near his farm is his enemy and not his friend. The work of friendly newspapers is not in a form suitable for preservation, and hence books of reference of reasonable size and cost are necessary. This association proposes to do what it can in the immediate future to meet the want mentioned, but it cannot do all that should be done, and it is hoped that other agencies will co-operate, each in its own way, in a work of such vast importance to the future welfare of all American industries.

Mr. KELLEY. In conclusion I desire to say that it will always be a source of infinite pleasure to me to know that in attempting to resist the interference of the British Government in our politics, through one of its subsidiary organizations, my utterances were believed to be a potent defense.

Mr. SPRINGER. So far as the action of the Cobden Club is concerned, let me say to the gentleman that I think the statement of Mr. Swank is an attempt to erect "men in buckram." I have heard of no such things among the people and know of no such literature being circulated in this country by the Cobden Club.

Mr. PEELLE. It was circulated all over my district.

Mr. CANNON and others. And all over mine.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. It was very liberally distributed in Ohio.

Mr. KELLEY. I sent to the Library (thinking they might be useful) for the letter of Mr. Mongredieu and other of the Cobden Club's publications; the answer of the Librarian is that they are all out; otherwise I would produce the ocular proof.

Mr. SPRINGER. What "ocular proof?"

Mr. KELLEY. The books themselves.

Mr. SPRINGER. The books in the Library?

Mr. KELLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. SPRINGER. Oh, I presume of course they are there.

Mr. KELLEY. But I say they were scattered through every Congressional district.

Mr. SPRINGER. I do not dispute the fact that these books are in the Library; but I say that the Free-Trade Club of England did not circulate any in my district.

Mr. KELLEY. Why, sir, their texts crop out in nine-tenths of the Democratic speeches in that campaign. They furnished the free-trade arguments of the campaign.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask only two or three minutes for the purpose of responding to the appeal made to me by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HEWITT,]—an appeal to which I should respond in the manner the gentleman desired if I were justified in doing so by the condition of the facts.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection to the gentleman from Iowa proceeding.

Mr. KASSON. I trust I shall never fail to make frank acknowledgment of any error into which I may have fallen, by which any gentleman on either side of the House may feel aggrieved.

First, let me say to the gentleman from New York that when I used the phrase that seemed from his manner to have been offensive to him, namely, "when such gentlemen say" so and so, I referred solely and exclusively to gentlemen who depend upon a transient paragraph in a newspaper as evidence for distinct statements of fact to guide the legislation of the House. In no other sense could the gentleman possibly have construed the remark as personal. If he did construe it in any other sense, I beg him to consider his construction erroneous.

Now, sir, as to the fact. When the gentleman on the occasion referred to made his declaration to the House, holding his hand in the air with this fragment of paper, the House being in an excited condition, some of us clamoring that the gentleman should be heard and others clamoring that he should not be heard, for the production of his proof, I supposed it to be something which would be accepted anywhere as proof. But upon the reading of the article itself, it gave no proof whatever. The gentleman will hardly dispute that point with me. I do not understand that the gentleman then had in his hand the paper which he has produced to-day, or that he had in his hand anything that could be called a scintilla of proof, unless that newspaper slip was proof. If that was proof, I ought to admit that he had evidence; if it was not proof, of course I must let my statement stand as I made it.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Did the gentleman hear me add that the superintendent of the works had himself told me there were over $3,000,000 of undivided profits on hand? That was the last thing I said in that colloquy—that the superintendent of the works had told me there were over $3,000,000 of undivided profits on hand.

Mr. KASSON. The allegation was that there had been a 50 per cent. dividend——

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Yes, sir.

Mr. KASSON. And the paper which the gentleman held in his hand did not contain the slightest evidence that there had been a 50 per cent. dividend. That is the point. Hence I was right in saying that when the gentleman made that statement and said, "I have the proof here," he had literally no proof in his hand.

On looking at the document which the gentleman has produced this morning I find that instead of these being the profits for a year—perhaps the gentleman stated the matter correctly this morning; I did not hear all he said, as he spoke very low—instead of these being the profits for a year they were the accumulations of eight years. By this paper which the gentleman has presented to-day (perhaps he stated this; I did not hear all he said) I find that in 1874 the stock was worth only seventy cents on the dollar. The judgment of the court refers to this fact, and then goes on to recite that afterward, with the revival of business, the enterprise became profitable, and the stock rose in value over 200 per cent.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Premium.

Mr. KASSON. Rose over 200 per cent. It further appears from this statement (perhaps the gentleman stated it to the House this morning, but I did not hear it) that this stock was paid for at the rate of $100 per share in new money paid to the company, and it was only the excess of the value of the stock above par that was represented by the appropriation of profits.

Sir, I try to make no statement inconsistent with the facts, and the gentleman himself will remember that when he suggested that the Committee on Ways and Means, meaning of course that he could do it if he were a member, was able to revise the tariff in thirty days, it did present to me a fair opportunity to remind him of his own mode of thinking and action, as illustrated in taking a newspaper scrap floating in the papers, which did not say that this was a dividend, and deducing from it the statement that there was a dividend of 50 per cent. in a single year.

I know nothing of these dividends; I care nothing for them except as connected with the great question in the discussion of which this matter arose. From what I have now said I think it must appear that I did try to be fair to the gentleman, and that I was justified in saying there was not in his possession at the time he held that scrap of paper in his hand a scintilla of proof to justify him in saying, "I have here the proof." I must insist that I was right in stating that there was not a scintilla of proof then presented by which the House could be guided.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Will the gentleman correct the statement which he has just made that the slip read did not declare it was a dividend. I read the slip:

> The question was whether about fifty thousand dollars worth of stock of the Pennsylvania Steel Company, which had recently been obtained by the estate, should be regarded as part of the capital of the estate or as a dividend given to Mrs. Thompson absolutely.

Judge Ashman took the latter view, that it was a dividend. Will the gentleman correct his last statement?

Mr. KASSON. It arose from property "recently obtained by this estate."

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. The question was whether it was a dividend or not as a part of the capital of the estate in the Pennsylvania Steel Works.

Mr. KASSON. As a dividend of the estate, it does not say "in the Pennsylvania Steel Works."

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. But as a dividend given to Mrs. Thompson absolutely.

Mr. KASSON. Now, sir, there is no escape so far as that thing is concerned, that there was not a scintilla of proof, at the time he flourished it before the House, of a 50 per cent. dividend, and nothing said about it being for a single year. Hence I cannot respond to the appeal which the gentleman has made, but must say I should not be willing to trust the revision of the tariff of the United States to a gentleman who would regard important facts as satisfactorily proved by a newspaper paragraph which did not even allege the disputed fact of a 50 per cent. dividend by the Pennsylvania Steel Works.

Mr. SPRINGER. It is proved now.

Mr. KASSON. No, sir; not even by this record of adjudication.

Mr. BUCKNER. Mr. Speaker, some weeks ago when an effort was made to make the pending proposition a special order under a suspension of the rules, I delivered my views on this question of rechartering the national banks; I shall not now repeat what I said on that occasion. I have the fortune of differing in many respects in the matter of circulation and banking from the views just presented by my distinguished friend from New York, [Mr. HEWITT.] Those views are discussed in the speech I have referred to, and if there is any gentleman here who takes any interest in my opinions he can find them fully enunciated in the RECORD. As I have said, I do not intend on this occasion to repeat what I then said.

Mr. Speaker, while I have been an open and decided opponent of the national banking system, I have no objection to banking proper. It is not to banking, as I understand it, that I have any objection. My objection is not to banks or banking as contradistinguished from note issuing, whether national or State. My opposition is founded upon the special privileges accorded to these national banks. It is an aristocratic feature in our Government that any man or set of men should have the privilege of making money out of his or their indebtedness. With Jefferson, Calhoun, and Jackson, I believe it is the sovereign right of the Government to emit paper or credit circulation, if it be needed for the business of the country, and not to farm it out to a corporation or corporations.

On that subject I differ from the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HEWITT.] I am not frightened by the bugbear that if we get rid of the national banking system we will necessarily have to fall back upon the old State banks. I do not believe there is any more universal sentiment in this country on the part of intelligent men in all sections than that we should pay the public debt as rapidly as the resources of the people will permit.

And that whatever circulation we have, whatever paper money is issued for circulation shall have, in the language of Mr. Webster, "the odor of nationality." Whatever opinion may have been entertained in the South and East the prevailing sentiment of the country now is that we should have a circulation, by whomsoever issued, that shall be uniform in value; that shall be as good in California as it is in Connecticut, one which shall be receivable at its face value in every part of the country without regard to geographical divisions. There is no sentiment more deeply seated in the minds of the people of this country than that the Government of the United States, either directly or indirectly, must use whatever authority it may lawfully have to secure just this kind of paper circulation.

But when gentlemen speak of banking do they mean to say that the right to issue one's indebtedness and make money out of it is banking? That is not, properly speaking, banking. That is not by any construction of the term a fair definition of banking. It is not the idea of banking as established by the best authorities on finance either in England or in this country. Our people have had a false education upon this subject. Banking consists in loaning money, receiving deposits, and dealing in exchange, and not in issuing evidences of debt without interest and exchanging them for the notes of other people bearing interest. In the language of Mr. Jefferson, which is the motto of the speech I delivered in the House a few weeks ago, "bank paper must be suppressed and the circulating medium must be restored to the nation to which it properly belonged." Let the banks be continued if you please, but let them discount for cash or Treasury notes. That was the doctrine of Thomas Jefferson, that was the doctrine of Andrew Jackson, and the same sentiment was expressed by John C. Calhoun; and with the experience of the last fifteen years in this country in the issuing of paper money, that is the statement that finds expression all over the land.

The Government controls and directs the issue of gold and silver coin by and through the officers of the Mint, and no good reason can be given why it may not, through the Treasury Department or a board of officers, perform the same function in the issue of paper or credit money. I believe it is the veriest superstition that ever entered into the heads of men that the Government cannot accomplish the same thing directly by officers responsible to it as it can accomplish indirectly by the aid of banking corporations. There is nothing but a morbid and groundless apprehension arising out of a want of confidence in the capacity of the people for their self-government that can justify a delegation of the sovereign power of the Government to corporations controlled by their own selfish interests.

But to come to the question now before the House, we are called upon to say what shall be done in the present emergency as to the banks whose charters are expiring. And I may be permitted to say in this connection that, whether from the speech I had the honor of delivering on this floor recently or from some other cause, there has been a sentiment inaugurated here and elsewhere that shows that the position that I and others have occupied in reference to this bill has some real foundation, and that it is not a mere war on the banking system or on the capital of the country, which the newspapers throughout the East especially have sought to make it appear to be. It is in the interest of capital and the business of the country, not that the charters of these banks which are about to expire should be extended, but that provision should be made against the dangers which will necessarily ensue to the bank circulation from the redemption of the bonds held for its security. This is the paramount question for the consideration of this House, and its importance is in no wise affected by the extension of the charters of the banks. I am glad to find that my distinguished friend [Mr. HEWITT] who addressed the House a few moments ago, and two of the gentlemen on the Committee on Banking and Currency at least, have admitted in effect that my objection to the passage of this bill as reported had some foundation in it other than mere opposition to the banks themselves.

I have opposed this bill, Mr. Speaker, because I hold that it is wholly unnecessary for any good purposes at this time. I have said that it was a delusion and a cheat, and that it did not accomplish what the country had a right to expect from the legislation of Congress, and that it failed to do what it ought to do in order to maintain a stable circulation and to prevent a disturbance of the business interests of the country almost certain to accompany the rapid payment of the 3½ per cent. bonds held by the Treasury as security for the bank circulation.

Now, to show that I have authority for that statement, and no less authority than that of the Comptroller of the Currency, I ask the Clerk to read from the annual report of the Comptroller that portion which I have marked.

The Clerk read as follows:

If, for any reason, the legislation herein proposed shall not be favorably considered by Congress, the banks can still, under the present laws, renew their existence if they so desire; and in the absence of prohibitory legislation many of them undoubtedly will, on the expiration of their present charters, organize new associations, with nearly the same stockholders as before, and will then apply for and obtain from the Comptroller certificates authorizing them to continue business for twenty years from the respective dates of their new organization certificates. Such a course of procedure will be perfectly legal, and, indeed, under the existing laws, the Comptroller has no discretionary power in the matter, but must necessarily sanction the organization or reorganization of such associations as shall have conformed in all respects to the legal requirements.

The passage, however, of a general act directly authorizing an extension of the corporate existence of associations whose charters are about to expire would, in many instances, relieve the banks from embarrassment. As the law now stands, if the share-holders of an association are all agreed, the process of reorganization is simple; but if any of the share-holders object to such reorganization, they are entitled to a complete liquidation of the bank's affairs, and to a pro rata distribution of all its assets, including its surplus fund. In many instances executors and administrators of estates hold national-bank stock in trust; and while they might prefer to retain their interests in the associations which issued the stock, they would perhaps have no authority to subscribe for stock in the new organizations. While, therefore, the legislation asked for is not absolutely essential, yet its passage at an early day would be a great convenience to many of the national banks, and especially so to the class last referred to.

Mr. BUCKNER. Now, Mr. Speaker, the Comptroller of the Currency puts it upon the ground that a failure to pass the bill would be an embarrassment to business; that it would interfere with the surplus fund of the banks; that it would interfere with the interests of executors, and of cestui que trusts, &c., but does not take the ground that this legislation is absolutely necessary for the reason that there is already an equivalent power in the law to allow the reorganization of the banks where there is no objection on the part of the shareholders; in other words, that the banks without any legislation, as is here proposed, are able practically to extend, if they desire, their corporate existence. In response to the reasons which have been urged in the extract from the Comptroller's report which has been read by the Clerk, I desire to say that we have no jurisdiction over the investments of executors, administrators, or guardians. It is none of the business of Congress to interfere with such matters in order to prevent them or the banks from embarrassment, and my objection to this plan is that we neglect the very thing of all others which ought to be done, and that is the protection of the public against the dangers of a lock-up of currency in order that the banks may withdraw the bonds deposited with the Treasurer, and then a curtailment and extinguishment of the bank-note circulation as it is presented to the Treasury for redemption.

It is because this legislation is for banks and bank-owners alone, because it is to enable them to go on without reference to the condition of the country and without taking notice of the fact that their circulation is being rapidly diminished and must in the nature of things diminish to such an extent as to disturb the business interests of the country, that I have opposed it and will continue to oppose it unless it is amended so as to obviate these objections.

Why, sir, what is it that we are proposing to do? We are making it easier, I admit, for these banks to organize, to go on with their business in the interests of the banks, but neglect, as I shall show you beyond all question, the great questions that come up and must come up, and are now present before us, not regarding at all the necessary diminution of circulation growing out of the exercise of the dangerous power of elasticity, which has been heretofore deemed the chief jewel in the crown of these institutions, the power to enlarge or diminish the circulation of this country at the will of the banks.

But, sir, it has been urged upon our attention here for three months, until some have been frightened into the idea that it will be regarded by the country as a war upon capital if we do anything but obey the behests of the banks and disregard the great interests of the people themselves, for whom these banks were organized.

Now, what is the relation of the banks and their circulation to the Government and the Treasury? We have but three classes of banking bonds upon which the circulation of the banks is based. About four hundred and ninety millions of them are now subject to call. Of that four hundred and ninety millions, two hundred and forty-five, or about one-half, are held by the banks as security for their circulation. Those bonds are all now subject to call, and are being called at the rate of one hundred and fifty or one hundred and eighty millions a year. And does any gentleman here believe that the amount we shall appropriate to the sinking fund is going to be less under any legislation that we may have had or that we will have? Is it not almost as certain as any event in the future that from one hundred and twenty to one hundred and fifty millions will be called within the next twelve months? We cannot assert from actual knowledge, but it may be estimated that one-half of that call will come from the banks. That is the condition of things; and it is given as a reason why the banks should have a continued existence, and why this bill should pass, that on one day in next February the charters of banks holding 54,000,000 of 3½ per cent. bonds out of 75,000,000 will expire, and that without this bill lawful money will be withdrawn from circulation in order that this amount of bonds be withdrawn. But if this bill becomes a law, will the banks thus continued in being be under any obligation not to withdraw their bonds and surrender their circulation? Will they be required by any provision in this bill, in consideration of the extension of their franchises, to continue in business and retain their circulation? By no means. It may well happen that the bonds, or a part of them, held by these banks will be called for redemption after they have accepted the provisions of the act, and they will be compelled to disturb the money market by withdrawing from the channels of circulation money sufficient to cover their outstanding circulation in order to obtain control of the bonds held by the Treasury. The bill of the committee relieves the banks of all embarrassment in continuing their corporate existence, but it fails signally in providing any security to the trade and business of the country against the dangers growing out of the redemption of the bonds and of a consequent reduction of the circulating medium. It takes care of the banks and their owners, but leaves the vast interests of the country subject to grave and serious peril.

The question arises, what will the banks do? I asked my friend from Illinois [Mr. SMITH] this question, and what does he say they will do? They have no alternative as to one point. The bonds on which their circulation is based must be given up and surrendered to the Treasury. [Mr. SMITH, of Illinois, rose.] Hold, I will report you correctly. They may buy 3½ percents if they take the risk of those bonds being called any day or month in the next two or three years; or they may buy 4½ or 4 percents. That is what he says they will do. Rather an uncandid answer I think, all things considered. We will issue silver certificates, he says, next winter when we see this trouble upon us with forty-one millions of bonds probably called between this and then, as stated by my friend from New York, [Mr. FLOWER.] Then we will issue silver certificates in face of the fact that the Banking and Currency Committee, of which we are members, have reported a bill that takes away the power of issuing silver certificates and repeals the law authorizing the coinage of the silver dollar, except at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, who is not charged with being its special friend. We have that bill now before us to be presented to this House. And yet that is the way in which this difficulty, apparent to everybody, clear as the noonday sun, is to be met, because the fifty-four millions of the 3½ percents that may be called or at least one-half of them may be called have to be paid, and upon that is based a circulation of at least twenty millions now in the hands of the people.

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman if it would be disagreeable to him to be interrupted?

Mr. BUCKNER. I yield with pleasure to the gentleman.

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. I know the gentleman from Missouri does not desire to misrepresent me. What I said in my speech was, he would likely be here next winter and I also, and then we would join in passing a law for the unlimited coinage of silver.

Mr. BUCKNER. The comment I make on that is, that it is a practical impossibility so far as this House is concerned. Already the majority of this House, of which my friend from Illinois is a member, have introduced a proposition to strike down the silver certificates as well as to stop the coinage of the silver dollar except at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury. So that is no remedy. The next remedy is to buy 4 and 4½ percents; and that is the only alternative my friend who sits before me [Mr. HARDENBERGH] and who has charge of one of these banks has; he may either have 3½ percents or 4 and 4½ percents as security for this circulation of his bank or part of each; most likely some of each of the three classes of bonds.

What are they going to do? Will they buy fours or four-and-a halfs? I say they will not. On the contrary, the operations of the Comptroller of the Currency during the last eighteen months show that the banks have been selling their fours and four-and-a-halfs for the purpose of realizing the 14 per cent. and 20 per cent. premium. The amount of 4 and 4½ percents sold by the banks to realize the large premium at which they are held is double that of these two classes of bonds deposited by banks newly organized.

Now, to show the gravity of this danger, I will refer to what I alluded to once before in a brief discussion on this question. On the 1st of May last there was a reduction of nearly $1,000,000 in national-bank note circulation from the 1st day of the previous January.

Now, that would not be very extraordinary but for this fact; it has never occurred before since resumption took place, for, since the fall of 1878, after our legislation in this House stopping the contraction of the greenback circulation and providing for the coining of the silver dollar, the banks have gradually and slowly increased their circulation month by month until now.

Now, how do my friends on the other side who are supporting this bill account for this? It cannot be explained except upon the theory that the circulation of the banks has been diminished because such a large proportion of it was based on 3½ per cent. bonds subject to call, and which have been called and surrendered by the banks. That process is continually going on.

I have a table here showing the amount of national-bank notes outstanding on the 1st of each month, from July, 1881, until May, 1882:

Statement of the aggregate amount of national-bank notes outstanding on the 1st of each month from July, 1881, to April, 1882, inclusive, and the increase or decrease monthly.

Date.	Amount.	Increase.	Decrease.
July 1, 1881	$354,610,935
August 1, 1881	356,894,453	$2,283,518
September 1, 1881	357,714,133	819,680
October 1, 1881	358,409,265	695,132
November 1, 1881	359,891,130	1,481,865
December 1, 1881	361,620,935	1,729,805
January 1, 1882	362,062,420	441,485
February 1, 1882	361,861,172		$201,248
March 1, 1882	361,152,532		708,640
April 1, 1882	361,626,637	474,105
May 1, 1882	361,070,299

Decrease since January 1	992,121

I have some other tables from which I have taken the trouble to compile facts, showing, in addition to what I have stated, the strong tendency of the banks holding the fours as well as the four-and-a-halfs to reduce their circulation by the withdrawal of the bonds on which that circulation is based. At the present rate of taxation it cannot be many years—not more than three or four—when every one of the three-and-a-halfs will be paid. This year we will take up about $150,000,000 of them. Now, whatever changes may be made by the little internal-tax bill which it is expected will be passed, in my judgment the revenues of the Government will not be seriously interfered with before the commencement of the Forty-ninth Congress.

Mr. DINGLEY. Will the gentleman pardon me for interrupting him for a moment? I was out a short time, and when I came back I understood that the gentleman had stated that there had been a contraction of the currency of the national banks since the 1st of January last.

Mr. BUCKNER. From the 1st of January to the 1st of May.

Mr. DINGLEY. I have here a statement from the Comptroller of the Currency that does not seem to bear out that statement of the gentleman.

Mr. BUCKNER. I have a statement from the Comptroller made up to the 1st of May.

Mr. DINGLEY. I have one up to the 1st of May, and from that statement it appears that the aggregate outstanding circulation of the national banks has increased since the 1st of January last.

Mr. BUCKNER. How much?

Mr. DINGLEY. Over a million and a half of dollars within the past six weeks, and in the aggregate over $3,000,000. Of course many national banks have withdrawn their circulation, but many new banks have organized, so that the aggregtae circulation has been increased and not diminished.

Mr. BUCKNER. I do not know how the gentleman makes out his figures. I have a statement here which I rely upon from the Comptroller of the Currency himself, showing a reduction of the national currency from the 1st of January last to the 1st of this month of $992,000. There may have been some increase in the circulation within the last ten days, about which I have not been informed.

I have some other statements to which I desire to call the attention of the House showing the present tendency of this national banking system wherever they are reorganizing, and several of them, perhaps a half dozen or a dozen of them, have been reorganized by the Comptroller. The operation of this banking system now is altogether different from what it has been, and for the reason which I have given. Formerly the bank capital was made up largely of bonds. Now the tendency is to sell the bonds and put the proceeds into capital and only retain bonds sufficient in amount to keep the bank within the legal limit, (thirty or fifty thousand dollars in bonds,) and this process necessarily leads to a withdrawal of bonds and a lock-up of lawful money and then a retirement of national notes.

The following table is compiled from Executive Document No. 43, and from a statement from the office of the Comptroller, showing number of banks, capital paid up, circulation, and classes of bonds, of banks reorganized, and new banks, from July 1, 1881 to May 10, 1882:

Banks	146
Paid-up capital	$15,942,168
Bonds deposited	7,785,300
Circulation	5,542,540
Three-and-a-half percents	6,784,300
Four and four-and-a-half percents	1,116,000

From which it seems that of these new and reorganized banks less than one-sixth of their bond-deposits consists of 4 and 4½ percents, and more than five-sixths on bonds (3½ percents) liable to be called for redemption at any time.

It also appears from these tables that of these 146 banks 114 have a deposit of $50,000 bonds and under, 1 of $400,000, 2 of $150,000, 1 of $140,000, 11 of $100,000, 1 of $200,000, 3 of $60,000, 3 of $55,000, 1 $67,000, and 1 of $72,000, while the paid-up capital is $15,942,168—more than double the bond deposits.

These figures are very remarkable in view of several statements which have been made here that these charters are not valuable. There have been one hundred and forty-six banks organized since the first day of July last, including, of course, the half dozen or a dozen which have been reorganized. That is, a larger number of banks have been organized since the first day of July last than ever have been organized in the same length of time, according to my understanding, since about 1865 or 1866, and five-sixths of the bond-deposit is made of 3½ percents, showing conclusively that the banks will not purchase either of the other classes because of the high premium they bear in the market.

Mr. DINGLEY. Will the gentleman permit me at that point? Is not his table, which he obtained from the Comptroller of the Currency, a table giving the outstanding circulation not only of banks that are in actual operation but of banks that are in process of liquidation?

Mr. BUCKNER. I have them both.

Mr. DINGLEY. That is the statement I have.

Mr. BUCKNER. Of these one hundred and forty-six banks organized since the 1st of July last, of which, as I have said, some few are reorganized banks, there has been paid in a capital of $15,942,168. Those banks have deposited bonds to the amount of $7,785,300, and have a circulation of $5,542,540. That circulation is based on $6,784,300 of three-and-a-halfs and $1,116,000 of fours and four-and-a-halfs.

The banks are evidently taking the advice of the Comptroller to keep within the national banking system. Yet the very same tables I have before me show how this process of the destruction or withdrawal of the currency is gradually going on. Take the First National Bank of Barry, Massachusetts. Its circulation of $135,000 has been reduced to $45,000. The First National Bank of New Haven reduced its circulation from $400,000 to $45,000. The First National Bank of Richmond, Indiana, reduced its circulation from $135,500 to $45,000. The First National Bank of Chicago has reduced its circulation from $90,000 to $45,000. The Second National Bank of New York has reduced its circulation from $225,000 to $100,000, and the Second National Bank of Cincinnati has reduced its circulation from $180,000 to $50,000.

Thus, while we are keeping up the national banking system, the bonds which they deposit are just enough for the purpose of keeping them organized under the national banking act. The remainder of their bonds are either called or sold, and as often sold as anything else, and the circulation must necessarily and inevitably be wholly withdrawn or largely decreased. It is in this way that the system may continue as long as one hundred millions of the public debt remains, and the number of banks not necessarily diminished; but it must be accompanied by a dangerous contraction of the paper circulation, a continuous lock-up of lawful money, superinduced by a withdrawal of bonds called for redemption, and a never-ending, still-beginning derangement and disturbance of the monetary affairs of the country.

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. BUCKNER. Yes, sir.

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. Does the gentleman think that we have too little currency in the country at present?

Mr. BUCKNER. No, sir; I think we have now a superabundance of credit currency.

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. Then I do not understand the gentleman's argument. Why does he object to contraction by the national banks?

Mr. BUCKNER. I object to it because it is regulated and governed by circumstances over which the country has no control. My friend will understand that when the amount of currency is fixed and regulated by law the business of the country is in a very different condition from that in which the amount of circulation goes up or down just as the banks may consider it their interest to surrender their circulation to increase it or when the calling in of their bonds compels them to withdraw the circulation based upon those bonds.

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. Does the gentleman desire the currency to be a fixed amount?

Mr. BUCKNER. If the gentleman speaks of credit currency I unhesitatingly answer, yes. The proposition which I have submitted as an amendment to the bill of the committee fixes the amount and keeps it fixed. This idea of an elastic credit or paper circulation is the grandest fallacy that ever entered into the mind of man. To allow any number of men to say what amount of currency we shall have and thereby to fix the value of all the property in the country, and as the amount of currency varies keep all values in a state of constant fluctuation, is a system which ought not to be tolerated. It ought not to be left discretionary with the banks or with any other power than the Government itself. What we need is a fixed amount of credit money, and the elasticity of the currency to be supplied by metallic money, and not by the printing-press and the engraver's tools. Every man who owns a particle of property has an interest in seeing that the circulation of the banks shall not be withdrawn at the mere will of those by whom it has been issued.

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. I will not interrupt the gentleman unless it is pleasant to him——

Mr. BUCKNER. It is not unpleasant.

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. Would the gentleman desire to have the same quantity of currency when prices are low as when prices are high?

Mr. BUCKNER. Why, sir, it is the amount of currency in the country that fixes prices; at least this is an element that very largely operates in fixing prices; and it is for this reason I object to the constant fluctuation in the amount of currency that must be experienced while the banks have the power to control the circulation.

My friend from North Carolina [Mr. DOWD] seemed to take in the situation very readily. While disposed to give the banks the facilities they desire for reorganization, he is not willing to do so unless at the same time we curb their power, and he thinks that the amendment offered by my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] will do this. I undertake to say—and when the amendments come to be discussed I hope to be able to show—that the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania will have no sort of influence or effect upon the operations of the Treasury, and ought not to have, and that its necessary effect will be to maintain a continuous condition of panic in the money market without in the least diminishing the power of the banks to produce the results desired by its distinguished mover. It is intended to guard against that which occurred when President Hayes vetoed the funding bill, when the banks frightened him as well as others into the idea that they were to be injured by that measure. The object of the amendment is to guard against any such occurrence in the future; but I do not suppose any gentleman will say that if the Secretary of the Treasury has $25,000 or $50,000 applicable to the payment of the debt, and to no other purpose, he is to defer for sixty or ninety days the calling in of bonds and allow them to continue to bear interest. But I will not go into that question now.

I have said that the withdrawal of circulation must in the nature of things go on, if for no other reason than the high prices which the 4 and 4½ per cent. bonds now command. The figures in connection with the process of refunding or redemption show that the 4 and 4½ per cent. bonds which have been put on the market by the banks are more than double the amount on which circulation has been based in the organization of new banks. Why should it not be so? The 4 per cent. bonds upon which the circulation of many of the banks is based are worth now in the market 120 or 121. The banks purchased them at 100. The 4½ per cent. bonds, which were also purchased at par, are worth now 114 to 116. Bank human nature is like all other human natures; it looks to its own interests; and when the banks obtain a circulation of only $90,000 upon every $100,000 of bonds, rated at their par value, will they not sell, are they not selling their 4 and 4½ per cent. bonds and getting the advantage of the premium and adding something like 30 per cent. to their loanable capital? It is this action of the banks that is also undermining the foundation of the national banking system. From this cause also the circulation must decrease.

By the going into liquidation of one hundred and forty-six banks there has been a diminution upon their circulation from $1,165,000 to $330,000. Under the act of 1874 the banks have the power to give up their circulation whenever it suits them and to increase it at their will and pleasure. It has heretofore been their interest to increase it, and it has been gradually increased; but now their interest lies in the opposite direction, to say nothing of the condition of our revenues, which will enable us to wipe out the whole of the 3½ percents by the time any material modification will be made either in internal or external taxation. And it is because this banking act which the committee have reported looks to the interests of the banks and bank-owners and stockholders, and not to the interests of the people interested in having a steady and stable volume of circulation, that I oppose it. This bill ignores every other interest than that of bank-owners and takes no concern in anything else than the convenience and interest of those connected directly or indirectly with banks. The very purpose for which they were originally established is wholly overlooked or disregarded, as it utterly fails to make any provision against the dangers of a serious monetary disturbance, growing out of the payment of the 3½ per cent. bonds, by first withdrawing a large amount of lawful money from the money-centers, locking that money up in the vaults of the Treasury, and ultimately producing a gradual but certain curtailment of the bank-note circulation.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to explain for a few minutes the two amendments which I gave notice I would offer when this bill comes up for consideration. These amendments are printed in the RECORD of the 14th instant, and I ask the attention of members to them.

Strange as it may seem, nevertheless it is a fact that here is a grand organization of twenty-four hundred or twenty-five hundred banks, scattered all over this country, which have no redeemability of their promises to pay. The redemption of the bank note is absolutely voluntary, so far as the banks are concerned. The only appearance of redemption now is through the circuitous method of sending a thousand dollars of bank circulation to Washington to obtain legal-tenders for it, and then sending the legal-tenders to New York to get gold or silver for them if it be desired. That is the process now, and there is none other. The bank, while it may have coin in its vault, is under no legal obligation to pay a dollar in coin in redemption of its notes; yet this banking system has been in operation for fourteen or fifteen years. Now, if it is to be continued I propose an amendment, as section 8, which is the same proposition reported last Congress unanimously from the Committee on Banking and Currency with some slight alterations to adapt it to the present condition of things. It gives the holder of a note the right to demand gold or silver at the counter of the bank, and it requires the bank to keep a certain proportion of its reserves in coin at all times. My friends on the other side of the House who profess to be the great advocates of hard money certainly cannot object to adopting this amendment.

It has the additional advantage of giving employment for the gold and silver coins of the country, and will save the Congress of the United States from the necessity year after year of providing secure and proper places of storage for the surplus gold and silver emitted by the mints.

I have said there is no redemption now under the present national banking system. When we are called upon to extend the franchises of the banks for twenty years longer I insist it shall not be without imposing some such condition upon them. The value of the vast privilege these banks have is proved by the fact they have organized one hundred and forty-six during the last eight or ten months. This profitable character of these institutions is fully appreciated by the public, and we should not continue them without putting some condition or restraint upon them. The one I propose is that they shall be compelled to keep standard coin of gold and silver as a reserve in their vaults to meet the payment of their notes on demand.

I have also proposed, Mr. Speaker, another amendment. It goes back to the question whether we should have a fixed and permanent amount of paper circulation in this country, or leave the volume of circulation to the capricious interest of each bank. We have, first, the legal tenders. The law of 1878, by which the contraction of the legal tenders was prohibited, fixes their amount permanently. No one, so far as I know, pretends to have any desire to change it. I propose to fix the amount of bank-note circulation, whatever it may be, at the amount outstanding at the passage of this bill, and then to forbid its being diminished below that sum. I admit that it is a pretty heroic remedy, but the country needs just such a remedy. The underlying idea of free banking is that when a bank puts out its circulation it has the right to call it in whenever it pleases. Now, I provide by section 9, when the bonds upon which its notes are based are called or redeemed, or when a bank goes into voluntary liquidation, the circulation outstanding should be maintained to the same amount. I provide that when it is surrendered by the banks, then the Government shall issue its Treasury notes to the same amount, and provide a fund for their redemption. In this way we can keep the volume of the paper circulation of the country at a fixed point. When you talk about wanting an additional amount adequate to the wants and demands of the trade of the country, let that addition come from the coin of the country, and not from the credit circulation or by the extension of the credit system.

Of course I understand that this will require that these banks now organized shall be compelled to do that which they will not do now; and if they accept the provisions of this act they cannot go out and surrender the circulation by voluntary liquidation. They cannot produce that condition of things liable to come on us now by the large withdrawal of bonds between now and the 1st of March next. That is provided against permanently; and if you will have a national banking system you will have its circulation fixed by law, and let every national bank know now, when it accepts the conditions of this bill, that until the Government is ready to redeem the bonds held as security for its circulation, it cannot voluntarily reduce the circulation below what is fixed in the law. Who is opposed to that? Who can object to it? Is it not manifestly an amendment which must commend itself to everybody who reflects on the subject?

Is there a gentleman present who is willing to deny that we have a sufficient circulation to-day? We have the $366,000,000 of national-bank circulation and $346,000,000 of legal-tender notes; and why is it necessary to increase it? As we have a Constitution which in my judgment is nothing short of a hard-money Constitution, and the only money of the Constitution is gold and silver, and we have a great silver and gold producing country, we should maintain a large gold and silver circulation. The product of our mines will thus be the means of increasing the circulation to meet the increasing demands of the growing trade and business of the country as they are enlarged by additions to our population and by new enterprises and increasing industries. That will give a steady, stable, unfluctuating circulation. It puts our circulating medium in a position of stability and steadiness, and makes us independent of the two thousand banks who will then have no power to determine whether we shall have $50,000,000 or more or less circulation, or less next year than we have had this year. It authorizes the issue of Treasury notes and for no other purpose than to maintain the volume of the currency; and it can only be reduced by the banks going into involuntary liquidation; or where the bonds are called for redemption by the Treasury, in which event Treasury notes can be issued in lieu of the bank circulation as fast as it is withdrawn in the process of redemption. This places the volume of currency directly in the hands of the Government and not under the control of corporations created by it.

Mr. HASELTINE. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BUCKNER. Certainly.

Mr. HASELTINE. Would you limit the currency of the country to the metals alone, when we have an immense increase in our population from foreign countries as well as the additional growth of our own industries?

Mr. BUCKNER. I would fix the amount of paper or credit circulation at a sum which would be adequate for all of the wants of the country. I believe that paper circulation, a large amount of it, has been a source of injury to the business of the country, and for that reason in part large imports are coming in, and no exports going out of the country except gold; and not only that, but I would adopt the English system, (which provides a diminishing credit circulation and has for thirty-eight years,) and let the increase come from the industry, labor, and increased values in the country which will be manifested by an increase of coin. That is my proposition. Time may show that we have not a sufficient amount of credit circulation to meet the necessities of the country; but I have confidence that the wisdom of Congress will provide relief when that occasion arises. I believe that for the next fifty years five hundred or six hundred millions of paper circulation is amply sufficient to keep prices in this country on a proper level, and with the vast additions which the industries and wealth and enterprise of the country will make to the coin of the country it will afford all the needful circulation for our growing population and the multiplying demands of its business.

I have not, Mr. Speaker, any great fear of Congress, nor have I any apprehension of the capacity of the people to govern themselves, as some gentlemen seem to have who have expressed their views upon the floor of this House. I believe that this is the most conservative government on earth. I believe that there is just as little danger that we shall run to excess on this question as any other government, whether monarchical or imperial. I do not say that we cannot and will not go to excess; I do not say that it may not be done; I have very little fear, very little apprehension that it will be done. I do not mean to say that there will not be fiat-money propositions and legal-tender propositions and other kindred propositions to increase the circulation, for it is a common thing to hear such propositions made throughout the country; but it is a difficult thing to interfere with existing legislation and the history of this country has shown it. Congress does not always legislate wisely and in the best interests of the people, nor can it be said that we are entirely without fault in our legislation; nor will it be claimed that there are no vices in our republican system of government. We all know that to be true; but when we compare this Government with that of any other, whatever abuses or disadvantages it may have, there is not a man here who will not say that with all its faults and with all its vices he would be in favor of standing by our system of government in preference to any other.

And so it is, Mr. Speaker, with this question of the regulation of the circulation by Congress. We may err, but I greatly prefer having it in the hands of the people's representatives, within the control of our own legislative power, than to confide it to two thousand corporations scattered all over this country, thereby putting in their hands a power which may be used to the prejudice and detriment of the whole country. We have to make that choice sooner or later. We have to determine in a few years what is to be the policy of this Government and who is to issue all the credit circulation. We shall soon have no other alternative. We will have to decide whether we will have a paper circulation which is to be issued by the Government alone, or which shall be issued by corporations. It may be evaded now, but the decision cannot be postponed beyond the redemption of the 3½ per cent. bonds.

I do not mean to say that Congress may not make a mistake on this subject, that it may not do wrong. But I say that so far as the great interests of the people are concerned, it will protect them infinitely better than any corporations that ever have existed or that ever will exist. It is one of the mistakes of this bill, and it is a vice of the argument on which it is sustained, that when you have authorized these charters, and when the Executive has set his signmanual to the bill, all the difficulties and dangers of the next year still remain. That is the vice of this bill; that it does not look at the condition of things that must necessarily occur. And when gentlemen talk about exchanging the 3½ percents that will be due between now and the 1st of March, 1883; when they say that the banks after they have been rechartered are going to buy 4 or 4½ percents or reinvest in 3½ percents that may be called in the next year or the next six months, they leave the difficulty just where it is now, without any rechartering and under the power and control of the officer who has charge of this business. And that is one of the great objections I have to this bill, that you are not guarding and protecting the rights of the people in the circulation; that you are taking care of the banks and the owners of the banks, but you are careless and indifferent, and ignore and have forgotten in this effort to give the banks a new lease of corporate existence for twenty years the great interests of the people; and that you make no provision for a stable, steady, and unfluctuating circulation. And I warn gentlemen on the other side as they have been warned heretofore, I warn them of the danger that lies before us, which they do not propose to provide for by anything in this bill.

I believe I have concluded what I had intended to say at this time.

Mr. BRUMM. Before the gentleman takes his seat will he permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BUCKNER. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRUMM. In your proposed amendment you provide for the issue of Treasury notes, legal tender for all debts due to the Government, but not for debts to the individual. I understood you in the committee to say you would not only exclude the legal-tender clause from the Treasury notes but you would also take it from gold and silver, and treat them all alike and not make any of them legal tender for private debts. Am I correct?

Mr. BUCKNER. I will state very briefly my views on the subject suggested with great pleasure. The idea of legal tender, as it is termed, as applicable to the Government of the United States is misleading. The limitation in the Constitution is not upon this Government at all. The limitation is upon the State governments, which have solely and exclusively jurisdiction of the subject of contracts. This Government has no power over contracts between individuals, and there is not a line or a letter in the statutes of the United States as to contracts between individuals. It is absolutely without jurisdiction over contracts of any kind between individuals. That belongs exclusively to the States. Hence my belief in the unconstitutionality of the legal-tender provision as to contracts between individuals. And when the Constitution says that no State shall pass a law to make anything but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts it excludes any other power in this Government from making it. Why? Because the States have complete control over the questions of contract to which tender is exclusively applicable, and because this Government has no jurisdiction over the questions of contract.

I said also—and that I am willing to maintain anywhere—that it is mere surplusage for us to say, as we did in the Bland silver bill, that the dollar which we coin shall be a legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private. Why? I say it is mere surplusage for the reason that if it is under the law a good tender, if, in other words, all the contracts payable in dollars are solvable and can be discharged by the silver dollar, it does not add a farthing's worth to say that they are a legal tender; because if I owe my friend who sits before me $1,000 and I have in so many words promised to pay him $1,000, and if the law—and that is the only question in it—if the law authorizes me to take a thousand silver dollars and tender them to him or the debt is solvable in silver dollars, there is no necessity or propriety for the law to say that the silver dollar is a legal tender for private debts. So that if, as I assume to be true, every contract made in this country for the last twenty years is payable in dollars, the legal tender clause does not add a farthing to the value of the silver dollar as long as it is a legal tender in fact and it is a good tender in discharge of anything that calls for payment in dollars. Parties may make their contracts payable in gold, and some have done it. The silver dollar will not discharge a contract of that kind. The Senate and the House decided in 1878 that for every bond which had been issued by this Government and which is now out the silver dollar is a valid payment and discharges the Government from that bond. And so it is with every note I make and every contract that is made between individuals that is payable in dollars; the silver dollar is just as good in discharge of it, without the clause which says it shall be a legal tender for public and private debts, as it would be with it inserted in the law, describing the functions of the dollar. A contract calling for payment in dollars is discharged by an offer to pay and tender of dollars, and for the law to declare that the silver dollar shall be a lawful tender in contracts of this kind is mere surplusage and does not add to the functions of the dollar in the slightest degree.

Mr. ANDERSON. Permit me to inquire of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CRAPO] in charge of this bill, when he expects the debate upon it to close? I make the inquiry in order to ascertain at what time those now on the list can be heard.

Mr. CRAPO. I have desired that general debate upon this bill shall be closed to-day, so that to-morrow we may enter upon the consideration of the bill by sections and reach a final vote upon it.

But my present purpose is to ask that general debate be closed on the bill at one o'clock to-morrow. The time for general debate to-morrow will necessarily be occupied by members of the Committee on Banking and Currency. If other members desire it, I would suggest that an evening session be held to-night for general debate upon this bill; that the House take a recess from five o'clock until half past seven o'clock, if that is desirable, for those who wish to speak on the bill.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like a little time to-morrow, say twenty to thirty minutes, to speak in the main to the amendment which I have offered. As some objections have been presented to that amendment I desire to make answer to them.

Mr. CRAPO. Cannot that be done when the House comes to consider the bill by sections for amendment?

Mr. RANDALL. We will then be under the five-minute rule. The gentleman might fix half-past one for the time to close general debate. I will not be any longer than I can help to fully state the animus of my amendment and to answer some objections made to it.

Mr. CRAPO. Then I will ask that general debate be closed at two o'clock to-morrow.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio.) The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CRAPO] asks consent of the House that an order be now made to close general debate upon the pending bill at two o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. ANDERSON. I shall be compelled to object to that. I would like to know how those of us who desire to speak can get an opportunity to do so?

Mr. CRAPO. We can have a session to-night. I will ask unanimous consent that the House take a recess at five o'clock this afternoon until half-past seven this evening for the purpose of general debate on this bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CRAPO?]

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill and joint resolution of the House of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. No. 5575) providing for a public building at Jackson, Tennessee; and,

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 211) to authorize the Librarian of Congress to accept the library offered to be donated to the United States, by Dr. Joseph Merideth Toner, of Washington, District of Columbia.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, a bill of the House of the following title:

A bill (H. R. No. 1993) to amend sections 2582, 2583, 2607, and 2684 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the collection districts in California.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed and requested the concurrence of the House in bills and a joint resolution of the following titles:

A bill (S. No. 336) for the relief of James J. Faught, late of Company D, Eighth Missouri Cavalry;

A bill (S. No. 591) for the relief of Mrs. Margaret Cassidy;

A bill (S. No. 612) to enable the State of California to take lands in lieu of the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections, found to be mineral lands;

A bill (S. No. 1068) for the relief of certain citizens of Tennessee; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 67) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan one hundred flags to the mayor and committee of citizens of Charlotte, North Carolina.

EXTENSION OF NATIONAL-BANK CHARTERS.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4167) to enable national banking associations to extend their corporate existence.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Mr. Speaker, so far as the amendments to this bill are concerned they will be considered, I suppose, under the five-minute rule. I will not, therefore, refer to them or consider them in what I now have to say.

The pending bill provides for extending the charter of national banks organized under the act of February, 1863, limited by subsequent acts, and so far as that proposition is concerned raises the question whether it is, as a matter of public policy, more desirable to have three hundred and ninety-three national banks, with a capital of $92,000,000 and a circulation of near $70,000,000, loan account of $150,000,000, stop business, recall their circulation, collect their debts, with all the resulting and attendant disturbance of business and contraction of the currency, and reorganize, if at all, under the general banking law—begin business anew, with new capital and new circulation—or to extend their present charters with such limitations and restrictions as Congress may in their wisdom prescribe.

It is as if the question were whether it would be wiser to tear out by the roots a tree which is flourishing in healthful growth and bearing proper fruit, and plant in its place another precisely similar, which must become adapted to the soil and overcome the shock resulting from being transplanted before it could yield either shade or fruit. Such a course with regard to the tree would be folly; a similar course in regard to the banks would not show more of wisdom.

I am proceeding on the theory that national banks are desirable and to be continued. It occurs to me that if the system is to be continued, every consideration of public policy and private business would suggest and demand that the present bank charters should be extended. The bill can be so amended as to make the charters conform to just requirements, and so as to place all national banks upon an equality in the matter of circulation, either by reducing the volume of the circulation of the old banks or removing the restriction placed on the new, so that all banks may have a circulation of 90 per cent. of value of bonds deposited, not exceeding, however, 90 per cent. of par value of the bonds.

But this bill in its very nature calls up the whole question of the currency. It involves our whole financial system. It involves the wisdom of authorizing by act of Congress and maintaining any banking system.

The world has long since ceased to have any patience with those philosophers and politicians who war against a banking system as such. Banks had their origin in the necessities of the state. They became an inseparable ally of the trade and commerce of the world. Banks have been the instrumentalities through and by which the capital of the world has been successfully and economically utilized in establishing trade and commerce. Without the advantages afforded by the banking system the trade and commerce of the world would not have attained half its present growth and extent.

They afford the means for keeping actively employed the great bulk of a nation's coin and currency, which would otherwise remain unemployed in private coffers, and without them exchanges would be so hampered and cumbersome that commercial transactions must in the nature of things have been sluggish.

No agency has wielded a mightier influence in the world's material development, and the feeling that holds banks and bankers as the natural enemies of mankind too often has its origin in envy, the worst and most despicable passion that God has implanted in man. The envious man is never happy except when comparing his own prosperity with the misery of others; never contented except when comparing his own robust health with the suffering of others—a disposition that never looks up to the good above to which one may attain, but only contemplates the wretchedness which lies below.

We all have our share of it. It is the animating spirit of the communist—it is the guiding genius of the mob. It is impossible to estimate the influence of the Bank of Venice on the prosperity of the state in the necessities of which it had its origin. The advantages it offered gave new life and energy to that city of the sea. That grand old institution stood a monument to the enterprise and fidelity of its managers, a help and support to commerce for more than three centuries, and survived until the armies of Napoleon overran the Peninsula.

The Bank of Genoa is another landmark of civilization, a witness of the growth of a wise system of finance. It aided in giving a new and quickened impulse to the trade and commerce of Europe. So with the Bank of Amsterdam and the Bank of Hamburg. They are inseparably connected with the commercial growth of Europe, nay, of the world.

The history of the Bank of England is the financial history of that country. Its attitude toward the state and its fidelity to the interests of the people of England has won and retained for it the confidence of all the inhabitants of that country. The Bank of North America was born of the necessities of our Government—was chartered December 31, 1781, by Congress, and subsequently, in 1785, was chartered by the State of Pennsylvania. It did much to strengthen the public credit.

The Bank of the United States, chartered in 1791, and that subsequently chartered, with all their defects were the embodiment of financial wisdom compared with the State or wild-cat system which succeeded them. Experience has demonstrated the wisdom of our present national banking system. It presents a unity of circulation, absolute safety to the note-holder. The man or party seeking the destruction of the system should present a substitute, sanctioned by experience and supported by something beyond the speculative theories of dreamers and temporizers. They should offer evidence, not simply that the present system has defects, but proof conclusive that they propose a scheme or system which is not only free from the defects in the one they would supplant but free from others which are more objectionable. Folly may tear down in a day that which it has taken philosophy a century to build up.

But there were those in the elder day, as there are those now, who possessed and now possess rare genius for destroying, but had and have little talent for building up.

Banks are a necessity. All intelligent men admit it. We must determine what their character and rights and privileges shall be. But of this further on.

Money is a necessity as a medium of exchange. It is the standard by which the value of all articles intended for sale or barter is measured. The experience of four thousand years has demonstrated that to adopt a measure of values which is variable is to organize fraud; and to needlessly adopt and, in the absence of inexorable necessity, maintain a variable and shifting standard of value is to legalize plunder.

Money should possess two properties to perform well the office it is intended to fill; it should possess intrinsic value; it should be of that material least liable to fluctuation in value. The value of an article is, as a rule, determined by the quantity and the labor and cost of procuring or producing it, together with its adaptation to the uses of mankind. When the article is to be used as money its durability and susceptibility to being put into suitable shape for such use are also to be considered. The world's experience leaves no doubt in the minds of most men that gold and silver are best adapted for use as money.

Gold for purposes of trade and commerce and all the uses and purposes of money is most desirable, and silver next. Gold is less fluctuating in value and less bulky to handle. They both possess intrinsic value. Their value does not depend upon the fidelity of men, the solvency of banks, or the fate of nations. Their purchasing power is recognized and acknowledged all over the earth, among all nations, civilized and savage.

England recognizes gold as the standard and measure of values, and to-day the value of wheat in Saint Paul and Chicago, of cotton in Charleston and New Orleans, of pork in Cincinnati and Saint Louis is determined by the price in London. Wheat in Odessa and cotton in India and Egypt have their value determined by the rate in London. The standard in the United States and in some other countries is variable, and may, and in fact does, change, not so often as the weather, but as often as a political party deems it possible to make a point by agitating the question of a change in the standard, or with reference to a double standard, or no standard at all.

Paper currency is, and is recognized to be, a useful and probably necessary auxiliary and representative of money; taking its place and performing its office for convenience of trade and commerce. It should represent so many coined dollars and be convertible into specie; all in excess is fiat, and represents a confidence game, in the ultimate winding up of which as well as at the inception and during the entire game, the laborers, the wage-men of this country, are cheated, yes, robbed.

The issuing of paper money by banks in excess of the coin provided for its redemption is wrong in principle and disastrous in practice. It almost invariably results in inflation, which defrauds the wage-men of the country twice, at its inception and when the inflated bubble bursts. It tends to give a fictitious price to everything, but labor feels its effect last and least in the scale of ascending prices and is the first to receive the pressure of its influence when prices start on the downward scale.

Let us examine this for a moment. Coin represents value produced; promises, whether spoken or printed, represent that which is to be produced, and the latter are of no more value standing alone when printed than spoken, except as evidence of the promise. They do not and cannot add a penny to the wealth of a State. Wealth is the result of labor. It is produced from the fields, the mines, and shops. It cannot be printed and published. If it could there would be no need whatever of taxation. Promises, whether spoken or written, are valuable or otherwise according to the probability that they will be redeemed. If a ten dollar note represents $10 in gold or silver, and we know it will be paid on demand, it is just as good as the gold or silver and often more convenient.

But if it is a promise to pay $10, and the payment is contingent upon the number of such promises, the goodness of the harvests, the condition of trade and commerce, the condition of peace or war, the whim of Congress, and the like, or the fidelity of bank directors, to compel the wage-man to accept such a rag as money is not only unconstitutional but a device which has enabled a class of bankers, merchants, and speculators to thrive, while producers and wage-men, that is, laborers, eke out a bare subsistence. The result is, a few years may suffice to enable a few to gather a fortune amid general wreck, while the majority toil a life-time to get a hut and bread enough to eat.

Paper currency not representing so many coin dollars is planned fraud and systematized plunder. Each note represents a promise, the redemption of which is contingent upon the happening of doubtful events; and the fluctuation is charged ultimately to the consumer, or the loss falls upon the producer or wage-man.

The tendency to inflation is so strong, and the disposition to engage in speculation so general, one condition tending to create and invigorate the other, that unless the volume of paper currency is based on coin and convertible into it at the option of the holder, and conveniently convertible, experience teaches that we must expect panics every few years. And when I say based on coin, I do not mean that the coin shall bear the relation of one to three or one to two. I insist that that paper currency shall be issued as a matter of convenience, and that the confidence game shall have an end, and I urge this in the interest of honesty and the producers and the laborers or wage-men. It is matter of history that the latter class lost more during the paper money panic of 1873 and 1878 than they made during all the so-called flush times before and since. Flush times indeed! With the beginning of what we are in common parlance pleased to call flush times, under the impetus given to speculation by an abundance of paper currency, prices begin to advance; we have all been witnesses to this; the cost of living to increase. The merchant marks the price of his goods up; it is the work of a moment. The laborer finds this to be the case and goes to his employer and asks that his wages be increased so as to keep pace with the enhanced cost of living.

The employer recognizes the justice of the claim. But, says he, I have taken this contract with reference to old rates, and beyond that I cannot tell how soon this upward move in prices may cease and go the other way. I cannot increase your wages now, but will do the best I can for you as soon as I can adjust my contracts and engagements to the changed condition of affairs.

What is the wage-man to do? Why, say you, quit, if his employer does not raise his wages. Quit, and, as a result, quit eating; stop the supplies that feed his family. Unfortunately he is controlled by a law that is inexorable. He must work to live, and hence cannot compel terms. It is not the employer, it is not the laborer who is to blame, it is an iniquitous currency system.

But, again, when the inflation has run its course and further inflation is no longer possible, when the game of confidence is at an end, we find that wages, the price of labor, have indeed followed at moderate pace in the wake of the advanced cost of living. But now comes the descent in the scale. What goes down first? Bread and meat, coffee, shoes, clothing? Not at all. The employer finds prices tumbling and little demand for his goods or wares, and he is compelled, absolutely compelled, to reduce his force and reduce wages.

He goes to his field, shop, or factory and says to his employés: "Men, you are aware of the disasters that have overtaken my business. I find it impossible to run on full time. I am compelled, in order to save anything from this wreck, to reduce my force; and I am compelled to reduce the wages." Well, suppose the wage-men say: "But we cannot live on the reduced wages. The price of living has not been reduced in proportion." But the wages are of necessity reduced. "Then I would quit," says one. Quit indeed!

It is a question of bread and butter for the wage-man and his wife and children. He may reduce their scanty supply, but not cut it off altogether. Now, who is to blame? The employer? No. The wage-man? No; but a dishonest financial system, an unsound currency. It results from the schemes of impracticals, who insist that you can make something out of nothing; that you can get something for nothing without stealing it or having it given to you, which I deny. I shall insist that the reserves of the national banks shall be in coin and not in painted rags, which in my humble judgment may never be redeemed. As we are not honest enough to pay when we can, it is not likely that we will desire to pay when payment becomes difficult or impossible.

One word more in regard to the volume of currency. It is not the volume alone that indicates the thrift and industry of a country, but the activity of the money, a nimble sixpence being better than a slow shilling. Nor does the hurry and rush in business circles nor the ceaseless activity of shops and factories certainly indicate sound business and financial health or lasting material prosperity. We are apt to mistake the hectic flush for the rose-tint of health. Business is sound and healthful only when there is a just relation between supply and demand. Abundance of paper currency invariably stimulates production. It also moderately stimulates demand. It begets extravagance, which is usually followed by destitution and want, while the equilibrium is being restored—nature's law of compensation.

I have said thus much as indicating the character that should attach to our measure of values, money, and the character of the paper currency which as matter of convenience may be used as a substitute therefor.

But I am told that I have not indicated what the volume of the currency should be. Well, nothing short of omniscience can determine that. It will in the nature of things vary somewhat. The only proper course is to have a currency in coin, or its equivalent in paper, issued by such authority and through such agencies as will be most likely to be controlled by the inexorable law of supply and demand. I would place that agency as near the people as possible and in the several localities where the pulsations of the arteries of trade and commerce can be constantly known and felt, and the healthful wants of trade and commerce ascertained. While it is impossible to tell just what the volume of currency should be, it is easy to determine what it should not be. And while I am not endeavoring to decide to a certainty just what the volume of circulating medium should be, I desire to enter my protest against inaugurating a system or perpetuating it which will inflate the currency, drive speculation wild, impart to business an unnatural activity, end in stagnation and panic, empty factories and shops, prostrate industries, enforce idleness, destitution, want, suffering, and consequent riot and bloodshed; with the probability that this disturbed condition will continue until the equilibrium of industry is restored and prices decline until they reach the level of equivalency between money and goods.

In the presence of such conditions it is clear that until a readjustment takes place, many mills and factories must close and the product of the several industries be reduced. Panics and commercial crises in England have occurred at least once in ten years. In the panic of 1816, 6,616 failures took place, and so many laborers were thrown out of employment that a revolution was seriously threatened. The panics in the United States are fresh in our recollection. Panics are not the result of scarcity of circulating medium. There is usually a scarcity of money. There is no lack of painted rags, called by favor money. They cease under certain conditions, however, to be a circulating medium. They will not circulate. Instead of representing money, they represent debts. They possess no intrinsic value. It is said that plethora of gold or silver may stimulate speculation, and induce overtrading and overproduction, which may result in panic and prostration of industry. That is undoubtedly true.

If the presence of a thousand millions of gold induces reckless speculation and entails disaster, and failures and unpaid debts to the amount of two hundred and fifty millions, the loss may not exceed that sum, i. e., two hundred and fifty millions. But if the same speculation is based on the presence of one thousand millions of irredeemable paper, and the speculations are, without reference to the character of the money, alike disastrous, what is the actual loss? Not two hundred and fifty millions, but one thousand two hundred and fifty millions. The one thousand millions in paper possessed no intrinsic value: it represented no value produced; it represented no actual wealth; it represented nothing which is the result of labor. And what ought to call upon it the special condemnation of just men is, that it does in the main cast the burden of the loss on those least able to bear it, the laborers, artisans, mechanics of the country, and a class, too, in no wise chargeable with the causes and conditions which entailed the disaster. Then, what do you propose? First, that we shall have a standard of value, a dollar which is worth one hundred cents throughout the whole year and over all the earth, in good and bad times; and that if we have a double standard they shall be practically and commercially of equal value and so recognized by the commercial nations of the world. I object to a system that makes the United States the simple depository of the silver of Europe, while they take from our people only gold. I object to paying for the goods we purchase in Europe one hundred cents in gold and accepting for the goods we sell eighty-five cents in silver.

We had it in our power to compel the commercial nations of Europe to adopt the double standard and agree upon and fix the debt-paying power of the two metals, gold and silver. But Congress while having the wisdom lacked the moral courage to do it. Congress prefers to do right; but will do wrong to catch votes. But shall we have paper currency? If so, how shall it be issued—in what volume?

Yes, paper currency is too important a convenience to be dispensed with. How should it be issued? By State banks and State authority? No; for if such banks were as good as they were uniformly bad, still we would not have that unity of circulation indispensably necessary to prevent ruinous discounts and rates of exchange. Under the old State and wild-cat banking system, the loss to the people—and by the people I do not mean the bankers, brokers, and speculators—the loss each ten years was equal to the whole volume of paper circulation. It was probably greater, but reliable statistics show it to have been as much as I have stated, and here again the loss fell in the main upon those who were in nowise to blame for the rottenness of the system, the mechanics, artisans, and laborers of the country.

Shall the currency be issued by the United States and made legal tender, the volume to be determined by the wisdom and patriotism assembled here? No. Aside from the project being unconstitutional, it would prove in the last degree disastrous. It is one of the ways that seemeth good to a man, but the end whereof is financial death.

But whence comes the authority? Not from the provision which confers the power to "coin money" and regulate the value thereof, for the power to coin cannot be construed into conferring the authority to edit and publish a paper and impart to it the qualities, the value, and debt-paying power of money. Congress may within certain limits determine and fix the debt-paying power or quality of money. It cannot fix and control its purchasing power.

It is said that the Republican Congress authorized the issue of paper currency, and made that paper legal tender. That is true, but it was not contended that this power could be exercised except as a war power, or rather in the presence of a condition of war. It was the utilization of that sovereign power inherent in every people, recognized in the Constitution, and referred to by Hamilton, (the right to exercise which was denied by Jefferson and Madison,) which makes the safety of the nation the supreme law. It was done when the death-rattle was in the throat of the Republic, our coffers empty, a mighty army mustered and in the field, with guns aimed at this Capitol, and a forced loan seemed to be, and in fact was, indispensable to span the chasm between the destruction and the safety of the Republic. The greenbacks represent that forced loan. They were issued in the exercise of a power that nobody claimed for the Government the right or authority to exercise in time of peace and public tranquillity.

The nation promised to redeem that forced loan as soon as the then nearly prostrate Republic should stand again upon its feet. The constitutional power to make the loan under the pressure of the necessity which existed, and to issue these promises to pay, has been questioned by a great party in this country. There were those who utterly denied the power, and a greater number still who averred that the greenbacks representing this forced loan never would be redeemed.

They were wrong in the first proposition. They are probably right on the last. They may never be redeemed. Congress has never seen an hour since the Government was able to redeem them when they had moral and political courage enough to insist on the nation maintaining its faith—to compel the honest payment of its debts represented by the printed evidence of this forced loan. Instead of that it is urged that national banks shall be overthrown and the printing-presses over yonder on the common shall be put in vigorous operation; that the Government shall again go into the rag business, and call it issuing money, publishing wealth.

Of the propriety and wisdom of such a course I desire to read an extract from the pen of Alexander Hamilton, and will publish with my remarks some other extracts from the pen and inspiration of the fathers, but which I have not time now to read:

> The emitting of paper money by the authority of Government is wisely prohibited to the individual States by the national Constitution, and the spirit of that prohibition ought not to be disregarded by the Government of the United States. Though paper emissions under a general authority might have some advantage not applicable, and be free from some disadvantages which are applicable to the like emissions by the States separately, yet they are of a nature so liable to abuse—and, it may even be affirmed, so certain of being abused—that the wisdom of the Government will be shown in never trusting itself with the use of so reducing and dangerous an expedient.

The more wisdom this House seemingly has the more liable it is to cultivate the abuse of which Alexander Hamilton speaks.

> In times of tranquillity it might have no ill consequence—

And so I believe—

> In times of tranquillity it might have no ill consequence; it might even perhaps be managed in a way to be productive of good; but in great and trying emergencies there is almost a moral certainty of its becoming mischievous. The stamping of paper is an operation so much easier than the laying of taxes that a government in the practice of paper emissions would rarely fail in any such emergency to indulge itself too far in the employment of that resource, to avoid as much as possible one less auspicious to present popularity.

These are timely words of wisdom if we do but heed them.

> If it should not even be carried so far as to be rendered an absolute bubble—

As it probably would be—> it would at least be likely to be extended to a degree which would occasion an inflated and artificial state of things, incompatible with the regular and prosperous course of political economy.

> Among other material differences between a paper currency issued by the mere authority of Government and one issued by a bank, payable in coin, is this: that, in the first case, there is no standard to which an appeal can be made as to the quantity which will only satisfy or which will surcharge the circulation; in the last that standard results from the demand. If more should be issued than is necessary it will return upon the bank. Its emissions, as elsewhere intimated, must always be in a compound ratio to the fund and the demand, whence it is evident that there is a limitation in the nature of the thing, while the discretion of the Government is the only measure of the extent of the emissions by its own authority.
> Its regulation would be by the wisdom of this honorable body. While I concede to it great wisdom, yet my experience and observation is that this Congress would not vote to redeem a dollar in the presence of a panic or a popular clamor that there should be an increase of paper circulation. That is my observation and experience of this House and of former Congresses.

And touching the evils which may result from an unsound paper currency, let me read what that eminent patriot, Pelatiah Webster, said when speaking of the State and continental money. He said:

> We have suffered more from this cause than from any other cause or calamity. It has killed more men, pervaded and corrupted the choicest interests of our country, and done more injustice than even the arms and artifices of our enemies.

I was asked, would you retire the greenbacks? I answer, I would pay them, and place the Government once again in the matter of issuing paper money within the harbor of the Constitution, which plainly restricts its authority to the right to "coin money and regulate the value thereof." Why, you are a Democrat, I am told? Well, yes; I am heart and soul a Democrat on the subject of limiting the power of the Government within the plain provisions of the Constitution in the matter of coining money, &c. That is, I am a Democrat after the old school, when that party had some fixed and recognized principles, some convictions on the subject of the currency. I regret to say, however, that when I enter the Democratic household in search of the time-honored principles of the fathers I do not find anybody at home; I stumble over the remains of Jackson and Benton and Buchanan and their contemporaries. But the family, those to whom the homestead was left, have moved out, leaving their convictions and principles on the currency behind them, and the Republicans have gone in and captured them.

Let me be just. I do find Senator BAYARD and a few friends at home, but they are lonesome and out of temper, because their brethren have run out and are actually throwing stones at the old house. I would pay the greenbacks as we are pledged to do, and disassociate the Government from all banking operations, and remit the issuing of paper to the national banks, under charters so restricted, so limited, as to impose individual liability; and with the certain result that bad faith, corrupt management, reckless issue, should entail the first and most disastrous calamity to the banks and bankers. Every one knows that while the loss resulting from State and wild-cat banks is as I have stated, no holder of a national-bank note ever lost a penny, and that because he could not.

And, referring to national banks, it is strange that there is no end to the folly that constantly repeats itself in shouting about the outrage of permitting the national banks to deposit one hundred thousand dollars in bonds and draw out ninety thousand dollars of what certain very clever but thoughtless persons insist on calling money. And here one of the blunders creeps in. National-bank notes represent credit. The national banker wants to loan the credit of the bank to such as may desire to utilize it in their business or pursuits. To facilitate this enterprise, and for the convenience of the bank and the borrower, certain printed evidences of credit known as bank notes are provided by the Government at the cost of the bank, and the bank is permitted, under certain restrictions, to loan these credit notes. The Government, however, for the protection of those who borrow those notes and those into whose hands they may come, says to the bank, "Before you can issue these notes of credit you must secure the noteholders against loss; you must deposit with the Government United States bonds to secure the redemption and payment of the notes;" not to secure their exchange for other notes or paper, but their payment, and payment means the delivery of gold or silver.

The Government does not give to the banker a cent of money, not a farthing. If it did deliver money to the banks there would be no need of providing for its redemption. Who ever heard of redeeming gold dollars or silver dollars? So, when gentlemen talk about depositing bonds with the Secretary of the Treasury and receiving so much money, they simply confuse and mislead and positively misstate the fact, through ignorance in many cases, and in a spirit of demagogy in other cases.

The whole system is simply a means of loaning credit to those who desire to borrow. Business demands such convenience, and the Government regulates its utilization so as to be most advantageous and safest to the borrower and holder of the legal evidence of the credit so loaned.

The statement that the Government or that the people are thus compelled to pay double interest, &c., and suffer hardships unnecessarily, is amusing, or would be if it was not pronounced with such seriousness as to befog and mislead. Will gentlemen devise some scheme, or suggest one, by which those who borrow money or credit will not have to pay interest? If they borrow gold they must pay interest. If they borrow greenbacks they must pay interest. The Government does not distribute Treasury notes gratuitously nor loan without interest. The bonds would bear interest even if not deposited to secure the redemption of bank circulation.

Touching the proposition that the bonds should be paid in greenbacks, it is needless to discuss it. Those who deem it honest to make such payment, regardless of the value of the greenbacks, are laboring with a difficulty which has its seat in their moral nature; logic will not reach it.

Those who think it is consonant with the spirit of the contract contained in the bond to compel the surrender of that interest-bearing bond which on its face provides for payment in money, and the acceptance in payment thereof of a large number of non-interest-bearing promissory notes, has a moral and intellectual make-up which is, I am glad to say, exceptional in this country. The Government was in the throes of dissolution. She had issued her non-interest-bearing promissory notes, and our people had taken them. Great uncertainty existed as to whether she ever would or could redeem these promissory notes. They had ceased to be worth more than fifty cents on the dollar. The Government offered to take them up and issue time-interest-bearing bonds to such as would take them. Many patriotic citizens took them. Now some gentlemen solemnly propose that, the country being now out of danger, these men who accepted the bonds shall be called up and told that the Government is ready and willing to rescind the bargain, and in fact insists on taking up its interest-bearing bond and restoring the non-interest-bearing promissory notes; and not only that but insists on calling it payment.

In an individual this would be plain swindling. In my judgment it would in the Government be something worse. Of course if the holder of our promises to pay, or whatever they may be called, are willing to take other paper which is par, there could be no objection. But until this Government is fouled with dishonor and debased beyond recovery we will not adopt a system of paying which does not in fact discharge the debt. Bankers do best and flourish most when trade and commerce are in their normal condition, when the law of supply and healthful demand regulate our manufacturing and producing industries. They find their prosperity in the general prosperity. Their reserves should be in coin. No paper partition of greenbacks should be permitted between the note-holder and the coin dollar it represents.

But what will become of your national banks when the national debt is paid? Well, I am not of opinion that as much good to ourselves or to posterity will result from the hurried extinguishment of the national debt as from its utilization to secure the redemption of our circulating paper currency. I would make it when reduced to, say, twelve hundred millions the security for our circulation, and also the basis of a postal-saving system, which would afford our people the means of safely investing their earnings and preparing a fund against age and the rainy day which comes to us all. As to the interest on the bonds, we collect the full amount from the banks in taxes imposed by the United States and by State and local taxation.

There may be a better system than the national-bank system. But nobody to this hour has pointed it out. When it is presented we will make haste to adopt it. Time and experience has demonstrated that the old State and wild-cat system could only be restored with a view to rob the laborers and producers of the country. If the world's experience teaches anything, it is that the issue of paper money by the Government, in the discretion of Congress, would entail like disaster. No nation ever failed to abuse that power when once conceded to it. No nation ever redeemed its notes so issued. Ours has not to this hour, and I predict that it never will.

The idea of leaving the volume of the currency to be regulated by the wants of trade and the discretion of Congress excites alternately laughter and disgust. The very time Congress should stand firm and resist the panicky clamor for larger volume of currency it would bend like a reed. Congress wants to be right, but there is one thing that it wants still more, and that is to be popular. It wants to protect the best interest of the people, but it must have their votes; and it unfortunately occurs that that which is wisest and best is not always most popular at the time when action is to be had, and it occurs that we sometimes please the people least when we serve them best, and vice versa. Can you not trust the people, questions some Solon? Yes, certainly. So our fathers did, but they none the less provided a Constitution to prevent them from governing themselves too much under sudden impulse, under stress of adverse circumstances, when prejudice, passion, and excitement clouded or unhorsed the judgment—a Constitution to restrain us in hours of peril until wise and intelligent judgment could assert its sway.

We have few systems, few institutions on this earth that are unmixed good—few that are unmixed evils. National banks are not an exception. I am told that in urging the observance of good faith on the part of the Government in the payment of the greenbacks and the bonds, and the restriction of the volume of our paper currency, I am digging my political grave. So be it. If to insist upon preserving the national honor and maintaining the national faith is to be buried, so be it. I shall have some consolation in remembering that there is a resurrection for the just. If for insisting that the man who labors shall not be robbed by being paid in dishonest money; if for insisting that the wage-man's dollar shall be worth a hundred cents throughout the year and everywhere; if for insisting that we shall not have under the influence of an inflated currency a few years of fatness, followed by a longer term of leanness and hunger; if to insist that our prosperity shall be real and not imaginary is to compass my political death, I will accept the reward of my stewardship with calmness and satisfaction. I would rather be retired by my people with the consciousness of having served them faithfully and been right than to be promoted by them amid acclamations of applause burdened with the knowledge that I had, to secure their favor, betrayed their interests.

I am asked if I would perpetuate the national debt; if I deem it a national blessing. I answer: A national debt is in a sense a burden. It may be so utilized as to become a blessing. I can readily see that if it was the basis and security of a wise postal-saving system, by which the mechanics, the artisans, the laborers, and such of the producing classes as would could find absolute security for the investment of their earnings, thus encouraging industry, sobriety, and economy among all classes, the debt being transferred to this class, would prove indeed a blessing.

It would not only encourage the cultivation of the virtues to which I have referred, but it would induce all these people to feel and take a watchful and intelligent interest in their government; to study carefully its proper functions and labor to see that it is confined to them. They would be prompted by principle and interest alike to shield and protect the public faith and credit in the preservation of which each depositor would find his hope and safety. It is a question of the greatest good, and rather than return to the old scheme of organized plunder of the ante-war period, which robbed the toilers of this country every day in the year, I would without hesitation fund the bonds at 3 per cent., after the manner of the English consols, and make them the security of the noteholders of the country and the basis of the postal-saving system; the good resulting from such a course being so far paramount to any ill or inconvenience it would entail as not only to be defensible but to render it greatly to be desired.

The charge that I am for the bankers and gold-bugs is one that a very moderate ability can make. Those who have such words on their tongues may not be malicious. Their trouble is usually congenital.

I have never eaten food that I have not earned in the sweat of my face.

I have three boys whose lines will not fall in more auspicious places. They, too, must eat their bread in the sweat of their faces. And in advocating a sound currency, and a just financial system and the preservation of the national faith and credit, I only desire to preserve to them the equal opportunity to labor with their fellows and that they shall be paid for that labor with dollars that are worth one hundred cents, with money the value of which does not depend upon the whim or caprice of a Congress or the fidelity of bank directors or conditions of war or peace, which shall be worth one hundred cents every day in the year and everywhere.

Mr. Speaker, in discussing this question of the redemption of the greenbacks I have perhaps gone somewhat beyond what would be sanctioned by what some would deem sound political wisdom; but, sir, there is a duty to perform, and I for one propose to perform it. I would rather be retired from political life for advocating a system which shall bring to the hearthstones of my country that condition of prosperity, that sense of security, that realization of contentment, which belong to and are almost inseparable from a sound currency and wise financial system, than to be loaded with the highest honors for the advocacy of an unsound currency, with the evils which it invariably brings to the business, the labor, and the laborers of the country.

ANNIVERSARY OF MECKLENBURGH DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE.

Mr. DOWD. I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the Speaker's table for present consideration the joint resolution (S. No.

67) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan one hundred flags to the mayor and committee of citizens of Charlotte, North Carolina.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Be it resolved, &c., That the Secretary of War be authorized and directed to loan one hundred flags to the mayor and committee of citizens of Charlotte, North Carolina, to be used in celebrating the one hundred and seventh anniversary of the Mecklenburgh declaration of independence, May 20, 1775, with such security for their prompt and safe return as he may deem necessary.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was taken from the Speaker's table, twice read, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DOWD moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EXTENSION OF NATIONAL-BANK CHARTERS.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4167) to enable national banking associations to extend their corporate existence.

Mr. BRUMM addressed the House. Before he had concluded,

The SPEAKER said: The Chair will call the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to the fact that within one minute the House must be declared in recess until the evening. The time of the gentleman has not expired, but if he will give way——

Mr. BRUMM. Certainly.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will submit some personal requests and reports from the Committee on Enrolled Bills.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. ALDRICH, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills and a joint resolution of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. No. 3542) for the relief of Charles F. Benjamin and Henry H. Smith;

A bill (H. R. No. 6179) directing the Secretary of State to take the necessary steps for the removal of the remains of the late General Kilpatrick, minister to Chili, from Chili to the State of New Jersey for interment; and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 111) authorizing the withdrawal from the Department of State of a certificate of indebtedness in favor of Mifflin Kennedy and Richard King against the Republic of Mexico.

Mr. PEIRCE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill and joint resolution of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. No. 5575) providing for a public building at Jackson, Tennessee; and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 211) to authorize the Librarian of Congress to accept the library offered to be donated to the United States by Dr. Joseph Merideth Toner, of Washington, District of Columbia.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois, for two weeks, on account of important business.

To Mr. WASHBURN, for one week, to attend the funeral of his brother, the late General C. C. Washburn.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PACHECO. I desire to take from the Speaker's table a House bill with Senate amendments for the purpose of asking the House to concur in the amendments of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks there will not be time.

Mr. HAZELTON. I rise to make a privileged report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will have to reserve it till to-morrow morning.

Mr. HAZELTON. I simply desire to have the resolution read and go on the Calendar. It is a report of the highest privilege from the Committee on Elections.

The SPEAKER. The time has arrived for a recess to be taken. In the absence of the Speaker the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. UPDEGRAFF] will occupy the chair this evening. The hour of five o'clock having arrived, by order of the House the Chair now declares the House in recess until half past seven o'clock this evening.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House re-assembled at 7.30 p. m., Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa, in the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the order adopted this day under which the session of the House is held this evening.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That at five o'clock this p. m. the House take a recess until seven and a half o'clock p. m., for debate only on the bill (H. R. No. 4167) to enable national banking associations to extend their corporate existence.

EXTENSION OF NATIONAL-BANK CHARTERS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the order which has just been read, the House resumes the consideration of House bill No. 4167. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BRUMM resumed and concluded his speech. [See Appendix.]

Mr. HASELTINE. Mr. Speaker, the bill under consideration proposes to extend the time in the discretion of the bankers during the next twenty years to control the issuing of paper currency. It will give the banks power to inflate or contract, and cause panics and hard times whenever they may choose to do so. Such legislation would place the American people at the mercy of a few national bankers. During the period of hard times, when silver was demonetized, and a large contraction of the currency caused by the destruction of the people's paper currency, the national banks contracted their circulation $29,305,485. This contraction was from January 14, 1875, to May 31, 1878. In March, 1881, the bankers contracted their circulation $18,000,000. This is the way they regulate the currency according to the demands of the people.

In the language of Jefferson, "We demand that the currency shall be restored to the Government, to which it belongs." We see no necessity for granting such special privileges to a few capitalists. Legal-tender paper currency, better than gold, should take the place of national-bank paper and stop all interest upon the bonds which now serve as the basis of the bank circulation. Pay the bonds, and restore to the people that currency which has been wrongfully taken from them. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CRAPO] says:

The pressing exigencies of the Government and the urgent condition of its finances, which prompted the creation of the banks, have not been forgotten; neither have the valuable and substantial benefits which through them were secured in the placing of the public debt and the maintenance of the public credit.

It was the "pressing exigencies" of bankers and money speculators, who were largely represented in Congress and who filled the lobbies, "which prompted" this creation, or rather, fastened this aristocracy of money speculators upon the American people during the last twenty years. There was but a very limited amount of bank circulation during the war. The Government issued notes after the establishment of national banks:

August 15, 1864	$299, 992, 500
June 15, 1865	321, 000, 000
July 15, 1865	193, 000, 000
Amount	829, 992, 500

After the war the bankers were very brave in "maintaining the public credit," in influencing the Government to change the people's currency into an interest-bearing debt as the basis for national banks. Senator Wilson, on page 787 Congressional Globe, second session Thirty-seventh Congress, describes this class of public benefactors, when they were using their influence to cause depreciation of the people's currency by putting the word "except" in the greenback. He says:

I look upon this contest as a contest between the curb-stone brokers, the Jew brokers, the money-changers, and the men who speculate in stocks, and the productive toiling men of our country.

Thaddeus Stevens, in speaking of this class of patriots, says:

The banks took $50,000,000 of 6 per cent. bonds and shaved the Government out of $5,500,000 on them, and now ask to shave the Government 15 or 20 per cent. yearly to pay the interest on these bonds. They paid for the $50,000,000 of bonds in demand notes, not specie, and now demand specie for their principal and interest.

This is the class of philanthropists who wanted national banks to issue the currency. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CRAPO] says:

I do not fear that the delusion which declares that a piece of paper stamped "one dollar" is equal to 25.8 grains of gold with the stamp, and which seeks by the despotic authority of law to create for it the same value and believes it can fulfill the same function in wiping out debt, will ever prevail with the majority in this country.

The depositing of gold coins in exchange for silver certificates, based upon eighty-eight cents standard fiat silver dollars, should be sufficient to satisfy the gentleman. (See official statements.)

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, SECRETARY'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., September 18, 1880.

Until further notice the United States assistant treasurer at New York will pay out at his counter standard silver dollars or silver certificates in sums of $10, or any multiples thereof, in exchange for like amounts of gold coin or gold bullion deposited with him.

JOHN SHERMAN, Secretary.

See page 10, report of the Treasury made to this House.

The Department has issued silver certificates at the several sub-treasury offices, upon a deposit of gold coin in like amount with the assistant treasurer at New York, and through this means certificates have been issued for nearly all the silver held by the Treasury. These certificates amount to about sixty-six million, and are now outstanding.

On the 1st day of November, 1881, the Acting Secretary of the Treasury suspended the issue of silver certificates in exchange for gold by issuing Department circular No. 108, as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, SECRETARY'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., November 1, 1881.

Until further notice the exchange of silver certificates for gold coin deposited at the office of the United States assistant treasurer at New York will be suspended, and Department circular No. 75, of September 18, 1880, is hereby modified accordingly.

H. F. FRENCH, Acting Secretary

The fiat silver certificates are preferred to gold coins. The full legal-tender greenbacks are preferred to either. Why not authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue the full legal-tender paper currency in the place of the national-bank notes?

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] said:

Nature will supply these metals to this nation and to all nations alike, and hence the volume of money will be steady.

The gentleman would limit the currency of civilization to metal money, or paper based upon metal money. This would be an absurdity, to limit all business and all progress to the accidental discovery of certain metals. I will show this more fully in my subsequent remarks.

Mr. Speaker, the Constitution of the United States established a government. It has jurisdiction over all those general subjects of legislation and sovereignty which affect the interests of the whole people equally and alike, and which require uniformity of regulations and laws, as defined by the Constitution. No one doubts at the present day, nor has ever seriously doubted the power of the Government to emit bills of credit. It has been exercised by the Government without question for a large portion of its history. This being conceded, the incidental power of giving such bills the quality of legal tender follows as a matter of course.

Clause 2, section 8, of the first article of the Constitution, provides for borrowing money on the credit of the United States. The power to borrow money carries with it the power to give to the lender an evidence of the debt thus created, and to make the Treasury note as valuable as possible by giving it the power to perform all the functions of money. It should therefore be a legal tender at its face value for all debts and dues, public and private.

The existence of the war only increased the urgency of the Government for funds; it did not add to its powers to raise such funds or change, in any respect, the nature of those constitutional powers or transactions. Therefore that power which gave us prosperity in war may give us prosperity in peace.

Clause 3, section 8, of article 1, says:

Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes.

Money is an essential element of commerce. It is as much the means or instrument of trade, as navigation or transportation is of intercourse; and is equally included in the regulation of commerce. Therefore it is of the greatest importance that Congress should provide a uniform currency among all the States. Daniel Webster sustains this proposition in this language:

It is clear that the power to regulate commerce among the States carries with it, not impliedly, but necessarily and directly, a full power to regulate the essential element of commerce, namely, the currency of the country, the money which constitutes the life and soul of commerce. (Webster's speech on surplus revenue, 4th works, 315.)

Article 1, clause 5, section 8, says:

Congress shall have power to coin money and regulate the value thereof.

The words "to coin," a verb, as defined by Webster, "is to form, fashion, fabricate, or convert into money." "To regulate the value thereof" is to assign it a value; that is, to determine its denominations as money, and the amount necessary to promote the general welfare, without any regard or reference to the commodity value of the substance which shall thus be converted into money. That material is best which is most convenient in use and least expensive to government. Congress is not limited by the Constitution as to the materials that may be used for the purposes of money. The expression "to coin," as used in the Constitution, has no definite or fixed reference to any substance or commodity value. It is affixing the authority of the Government to the substance which is converted into money. The Constitution nowhere provides in express terms that Congress shall have power to make gold and silver a legal tender.

We ought to talk of coining notes, for though the design is impressed on paper instead of metal, the function of the note is exactly the same as that of a representative token.—Jevons, Money and the Mechanism of Exchange, page 318.

Anderson, in his Manual of the Constitution, page 110, says:

The power to coin money is an attribute of sovereignty, and is therefore properly placed with the General Government. Without doubt Congress would have possessed the power had the Constitution contained no specific grant to this effect. A subsequent section prohibits the States from coining money.

On this point the opinion of Daniel Webster, who won the title of "Constitutional Expounder," is timely and conclusive:

By denying the State all power of emitting bills of credit, or making anything but gold and silver a tender in payment of debts, the whole control over the standard of value and medium of payment is vested in the General Government. Delegating this grant to Congress and prohibition to the States, a just reading of the provisions is this: "Congress shall have power to coin money, emit bills of credit, and make anything besides gold and silver legal tender in payment of debts."

Franklin said that the statesmen of Europe could not understand how America carried on a war for several years without any specie.

The States possessed and exercised the power to make money out of other materials than the metals, and when they came into the confederation they did not relinquish the power, but when the people of all the colonies united "to form a more perfect Union," they took from the States the control of the money and gave it to the General Government. Congress has clearly defined constitutional power to declare what shall circulate as money within the United States, in the regulation of commerce, a power which is exercised by all sovereign nations upon the earth.

The amount of the currency of the country should bear a certain proportion to its trade, revenue, population, and expenditures. The business of civilization cannot be limited in any degree to the accidental discovery of any metal, or to the selfish interests of any company of usurers, Shylocks, and sharpers. The best money for the American Republic is that which can be controlled by Congress in the quantity adapted to the increase of population and the increasing business of civilization, and which shall have the money power given exclusively by law, and controlled by the people through their representatives. The policy of the American statesman should be to gradually increase the currency to correspond with the increase of population, thereby stimulating the industries and increasing the stock of labor, in which consists all real power and riches.

Money is the legal measure and representative of value. There is no commodity value in money. The Supreme Court has truthfully said, "Value is an ideal thing;" and its measure must of necessity be ideal. Every sovereign power on the earth has established by law what shall be the legal representative of value. There can be no such thing as a standard of value. Value, strictly speaking, begins and ends with human desires. There can be a standard of anything which has weight, length, breadth, or thickness, but not of a thing which is ideal. The Supreme Court has said, "The gold or silver thing we call a dollar is in no sense a standard of a dollar. It is a representative of it."

The law power fixes this representative. Money is that which law requires the creditor to receive in payment for debts. The great political economist Say has shown that most of the European wars of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries grew out of false principles relating to this subject. The destruction of the people's money in the American colonies by the English Parliament was one of the great causes of the American Revolution. The contraction of the currency in England in 1820 caused suffering, starvation, cries for bread, and shooting of the hungry people. The recent fearful suffering, labor strikes, and great destruction of property in this country were the result of a false financial policy. Governor Mosgrove recently said:

I suppose the teachers of no science have so much human misery to answer for or have assisted at so much fraud as the doctors of political economy.

Aristotle, the great Grecian philosopher, was right when he said, "Law makes money." And his pupil, the great Plato, said, "that is worth most for a nation's currency which is worth least to other nations." Our Franklin taught the same philosophy. Money issued wholly by the Government and not by bankers or interested parties would be perfectly safe from abuse, and it would put an end to that periodical fluctuation of prices, commercial crises, panics, paralyzation of industry, pauperism, and crime which have cursed every land where usurious Shylocks have controlled the issuing of currency in the interest of individuals independent of the government.

Mr. Calhoun, of South Carolina, said in the Senate, September 19, 1837:

It appears to me, after bestowing the best reflection I can give the subject, that no convertible paper, that is, no paper whose credit rests upon a promise to pay, is suitable for currency. * * * I would ask, why should the Government mingle its credit with that of private corporations? No one can doubt but that the Government credit is better than that of any bank, more stable and more safe. Why then should it mix it up with the less perfect credit of those institutions? Why not use its own credit to the amount of its own transactions?

Thomas Jefferson, in his letter to Mr. Epps, said:

Bank paper must be suppressed, and the circulating medium must be restored to the nation to whom it belongs. It is the only fund on which they can rely for loans; it is the only resource which can never fail them, and it is an abundant one for every necessary purpose. Treasury bills, bottomed on taxes, bearing or not bearing interest, as may be found necessary, thrown into circulation will take the place of so much gold or silver, which last, when crowded, will find an efflux into other countries, and thus keep the quantum of medium at its salutary level.

Benjamin Franklin, in reference to our currency, said:

On the whole, no method has hitherto been found to establish a medium of trade, equal in all its advantages to bills of credit, made a general legal tender. Paper money, well founded, has great advantages over gold and silver, being light and convenient for handling in large sums, and not likely to be reduced by demands for exportation.

Mr. Calhoun also said:

I now undertake to affirm, and without the least fear that I can be answered, that a paper issued by Government, with the simple promise to receive it for all its dues, leaving its creditors to take it or gold or silver at their option, would, to the extent it could circulate, form a perfect paper circulation, which could not be abused by the Government; that it would be as uniform in value as the metals themselves, and I shall be able to prove that it is within the Constitution and powers of Congress to use such a paper in the management of its finance, according to the most rigid rule of construing the Constitution.

The framers of the Constitution had been accustomed to the use of legal-tender paper money. Each of the colonies issued its money of paper and made it a tender in payment of debts until the Parliament of England took from them this power. At the very beginning of the war Massachusetts and other colonies disregarded the prohibition, and again declared their bills a legal tender. (Bancroft's History, volume 7, page 324.)

From the formation of the union of the colonies in 1774 to the adoption of the present Constitution the money of the country was mostly paper. It was that paper that gave us a country, as it was the greenback that saved us as a nation.

The United States Supreme Court in December, 1870, (12 Wall.,) fully sustains our views, in the following language:

Indeed, legal-tender Treasury notes have become the universal measure of values. If, now, by our decision, it be established that these debts and obligations can be discharged only by gold coin; if, contrary to the expectation of all parties to these contracts, legal-tender notes are rendered unavailable, the Government has become an instrument of the grossest injustice; all debtors are loaded with an obligation it was never contemplated they should assume; a large percentage is added to every debt, and such must become the demand for gold to satisfy contracts that ruinous sacrifices, general distress, and bankruptcy may be expected. These consequences are too obvious to admit of question; and there is no well-founded distinction to be made between the constitutional validity of an act of Congress declaring Treasury notes a legal tender for the payment of debts contracted after its passage and that of an act making them a legal tender for the discharge of all debts, as well those incurred before as those made after its enactment. There may be a difference in the effects produced by the acts and in the hardship of their operation, but in both cases the fundamental question, that which tests the validity of the legislation, is: Can Congress constitutionally give to Treasury notes the character and qualities of money? Can such notes be constituted a legitimate circulating medium, having a defined legal value? If they can, then such notes must be available to fulfill all contracts (not expressly excepted) solvable in money, without reference to the time when the contracts were made.

Making the notes legal tenders gave them a new use, and it needs no argument to show that the value of things is in proportion to the uses to which they may be applied.

The case of Veazie Bank vs. Tenno, 8 Wall., 533, presents a suggestive illustration. Then a tax of 10 per cent. on State-bank notes in circulation was held constitutional, not merely because it was a means of raising revenue, but as an instrument to put out of existence such a circulation in competition with notes issued by the Government. There this court, speaking through the Chief-Justice, avowed that it is the constitutional right of Congress to provide a currency for the whole country; that this might be done by coin or United States notes or notes of national banks, and that it cannot be questioned Congress may constitutionally secure the benefit of such a currency to the people by appropriate legislation.

It was said there can be no question of the power of this Government to emit bills of credit; to make them receivable in payment of debts to itself; to fit them for use by those who see fit to use them in all the transactions of commerce; to make them a currency uniform in value and description, and convenient and useful for circulation. Here the substantive power to tax was allowed to be employed for improving the currency. It is not easy to see why, if State-bank notes can be taxed out of existence for the purpose of indirectly making United States notes more convenient and useful for commercial purposes, the same end may not be secured directly by making them a legal tender.

Concluding, then, that the provision which made Treasury notes a legal tender for the payment of all debts other than those expressly excepted was not an inappropriate means for carrying into execution the legitimate powers of the Government, we proceed to inquire whether it was forbidden by the letter or spirit of the Constitution. It is not claimed that any express prohibition exists, but it is insisted that the spirit of the Constitution was violated by the enactment.

Here those who assert the unconstitutionality of the acts mainly rest their argument. They claim that the clause which conferred upon Congress power "to coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin," contains an implication that nothing but that which is the subject of coinage, nothing but the precious metals can ever be declared by law to be money, or to have the uses of money. If by this is meant that because certain powers over the currency are expressly given to Congress, all other powers relating to the same subject are impliedly forbidden, we need only remark that such is not the manner in which the Constitution has always been construed. On the contrary, it has been ruled that power over a particular subject may be exercised as auxiliary to an express power, though there is another express power relating to the same subject, less comprehensive. (United States vs. Marigold, 9 How., 560.) There an express power to punish a certain class of crimes (the only direct reference to criminal legislation contained in the Constitution) was not regarded as an objection to deducing authority to punish other crimes from another substantive and defined grant of power. There are other decisions to the same effect.

To assert, then, that the clause enabling Congress to coin money and regulate its value tacitly implies a denial of all other power over the currency of the nation is an attempt to introduce a new rule of construction against the solemn decision of this court. So far from its containing a lurking prohibition, many have thought that it was intended to confer upon Congress that general power over the currency which has always been an acknowledged attribute of sovereignty in every other civilized nation than our own, especially when considered in connection with the other clause, which denies to the States the power to coin money, emit bills of credit, or make anything but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts.

We do not assert this now, but there are some considerations touching these clauses which tend to show that if any implications are to be deduced from them, they are of an enlarging rather than a restraining character. The Constitution was intended to frame a government supreme in some particulars over States and people. It was designed to provide the same currency, having a uniform legal value in all the States. It was for this reason that the power to coin money and regulate its value was conferred upon the Federal Government, while the same power, as well as the power to emit bills of credit, was withdrawn from the States. The States can no longer declare what shall be money, or regulate its value. Whatever power there is over the currency is vested in Congress. If the power to declare what is money is not in Congress, it is annihilated. This may indeed have been intended. Some powers that usually belong to sovereignties were extinguished, but their extinguishment was not left to inference. In most cases, if not in all, when it was intended that governmental powers, commonly acknowledged as such, should cease to exist, both in the States and in the Federal Government, it was expressly denied to both, as well to the United States as to the individual States. And generally, when one of such powers was expressly denied to the State only, it was for the purpose of rendering the Federal power more complete and exclusive.

Why, then, it may be asked, if the design was to prohibit to the new Government, as well as to the States, the general power over the currency which the States had when the Constitution was framed, was such denial not expressly extended to the new Government as it was to the States? In view of this it might be argued with much force that when it is considered in what brief and comprehensive terms the Constitution speaks, how sensible its framers must have been that emergencies might arise when the precious metals (then more scarce than now) might prove inadequate to the necessities of the Government and the demands of the people, when it is remembered that paper money was almost exclusively in use in the States as the medium of exchange, and when the great evil sought to be remedied was the want of uniformity in the current value of money, it might be argued, we say, that the gift of power to coin money and regulate the value thereof was understood as conveying general power over the currency—the power which had belonged to the States and which they surrendered.

Such a construction, it might be said, would be in close analogy to the mode of construing other substantive powers granted to Congress. They have never been construed literally, and the Government could not exist if they were. Thus the power to carry on war was conferred by the power to "declare war." The whole system of the transportation of the mails is built upon the power to establish post-offices and post-roads. The power to regulate commerce has also been extended far beyond a letter of the grant. Even the advocates of a strict literal construction of the phrase "to coin money and regulate the value thereof," while insisting that it defines the material to be coined as metal, are compelled to concede to Congress large discretion in all other particulars.

The Constitution does not ordain what metals may be coined or prescribe that the legal value of the metals when coined shall correspond at all with their intrinsic value in the market. Nor does it even affirm that Congress may declare anything to be legal tender for the payment of debts. Confessedly the power to regulate the value of money coined and of foreign coins is not exhausted by the first regulation. More than once in our history has the regulation been changed without any denial of the power of Congress to change it, and it seems to have been left to Congress to determine alike what metal shall be coined, its purity, and how far its statutory value as money shall correspond from time to time with the market value of the same metal as bullion.

How then can the grant of a power to coin money and regulate its value, made in terms so liberal and unrestrained, coupled also with a denial to the States of all power over the currency, be regarded as an implied prohibition to Congress against declaring Treasury notes a legal tender, if such declaration is appropriate and adapted to carrying into execution the admitted powers of the Government?

We do not, however, rest our assertion of the power of Congress to enact legal-tender laws upon this grant. We assert only that the grant can, in no just sense, be regarded as containing an implied prohibition against their enactment, and that if it raises any implications, they are of complete power over the currency, rather than restraining.

We come next to the argument much used, and, indeed, the main reliance of those who assert the unconstitutionality of the legal-tender acts. It is that they are prohibited by the spirit of the Constitution, because they indirectly impair the obligation of contracts.

The argument, of course, relates only to those contracts which were made before February, 1862, when the first act was passed, and it has no bearing upon the question whether the acts are valid when applied to contracts made after their passage. The argument assumes two things: first, that the acts do, in effect, impair the obligation of contracts; and, second, that Congress is prohibited from taking any action which may indirectly have that effect. Neither of these assumptions can be accepted. It is true that under the acts, a debtor, who became such before they were passed may discharge his debt with the notes authorized by them, and the creditor is compellable to receive such notes in discharge of his claim.

But whether the obligation of the contract is thereby weakened can be determined only after considering what was the contract obligation. It was not a duty to pay gold or silver, or the kind of money recognized by law at the time when the contract was made, nor was it a duty to pay money of equal intrinsic value in the market. (We speak now of contracts to pay money generally, not contracts to pay some specifically-defined species of money.) The expectation of the creditor and the anticipation of the debtor may have been that the contract would be discharged by the payment of coined metals, but neither the expectation of the party to the contract respecting its fruits nor the anticipation of the other constitutes its obligation. There is a well-recognized distinction between the expectation of the parties to a contract and the duty imposed by it. (Apsden vs. Austin, 5 Ad. and Ellis U. S., 671; Dunn vs. Sayles, ibid., 685; Coffin vs. Landis, 10 Wright, 426.)

Were it not so the expectation of results would be always equivalent to a binding engagement that they should follow. But the obligation of a contract to pay money is to pay that which the law shall recognize as money when the payment is to be made. If there is anything settled by decision it is this, and we do not understand it to be controverted. (Davies, 28; Barrington vs. Potter, Dyer, volume 81, folio 67; Faw vs. Marsteller, 2 Cranch, 29.)

No one ever doubted that a debt of $1,000, contracted before 1834, could be paid by one hundred eagles coined after that year, though they contained no more gold than ninety-four eagles such as were coined when the contract was made, and this, not because of the intrinsic value of the coin, but because of its legal value. The eagles coined after 1834 were not money until they were authorized by law, and had they been coined before without a law fixing their legal value they could no more have paid a debt than uncoined bullion, or cotton, or wheat.

Every contract for the payment of money simply is necessarily subject to the constitutional power of the Government over the currency, whatever that power may be, and the obligation of the parties is, therefore, assumed with reference to that power. Nor is this singular. A covenant for quiet enjoyment is not broken nor is its obligation impaired by the Government taking the land granted in virtue of its right of eminent domain. The expectation of the covenantee may be disappointed. He may not enjoy all he anticipated, but the grant was made and the covenant undertaken in subordination to the paramount right of the Government. (Dobbins vs. Brown, 2 Jones, Pennsylvania, 75; Workman vs. Miffin, 6 Casey, 362.)

We have been asked whether Congress can declare that a contract to deliver a quantity of grain may be satisfied by the tender of a less quantity. Undoubtedly not. But this is a false analogy. There is a wide distinction between a tender of quantities, or of specific articles, and a tender of legal values. Contracts for the delivery of specific articles belong exclusively to the domain of State legislation, while contracts for the payment of money are subject to the authority of Congress, at least so far as relates to the means of payment. They are engagements to pay with lawful money of the United States, and Congress is empowered to regulate that money. It cannot, therefore, be maintained that the legal-tender acts impaired the obligation of contracts.

Nor can it be truly asserted that Congress may not by its action indirectly impair the obligation of contracts if by the expression be meant rendering contracts fruitless, or partially fruitless. Directly it may, confessedly, by passing a bankrupt act embracing past as well as future transactions. This is obliterating contracts entirely, so it may relieve parties from their apparent obligations indirectly in a multitude of ways. It may declare war or, even in peace, pass non-intercourse acts or direct an embargo. All such measures may, and must, operate seriously upon existing contracts, and may not merely hinder, but relieve the parties to such contracts entirely from performance.

It is, then, clear that the powers of Congress may be exerted, though the effect of such exertion may be in one case to annul and in other cases to impair the obligation of contracts. And it is no sufficient answer to this to say it is true only when the powers exerted were expressly granted. There is no ground for any such distinction. It has no warrant in the Constitution or in any of the decisions of this court. We are accustomed to speak for mere convenience of the express and implied powers conferred upon Congress; but in fact the auxiliary powers, those necessary and appropriate to the execution of other powers singly described, are as expressly given as is the power to declare war or to establish uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcy. They are not catalogued, no list of them is made, but they are grouped in the last clause of section 8 of the first article, and granted in the same words in which all other powers are granted to Congress. And this court has recognized no such distinction as is now attempted. An embargo suspends many contracts and renders performance of others impossible; yet the power to enforce it has been declared constitutional. (Gibbons vs. Ogden, 9 Wheat., 1.)

The power to enact a law directing an embargo is one of the auxiliary powers, existing only because appropriate in time of peace to regulate commerce, or appropriate to carrying on war. Though not conferred as a substantive power, it has not been thought to be in conflict with the Constitution because it impairs indirectly the obligation of contracts. That discovery calls for a new reading of the Constitution.

If, then, the legal-tender acts were justly chargeable with impairing contract obligations, they would not, for that reason, be forbidden, unless a different rule is to be applied to them from that which has hitherto prevailed in the construction of other powers granted by the fundamental law. But, as already intimated, the objection misapprehends the nature and extent of the contract obligation spoken of in the Constitution. As in a state of civil society property of a citizen or subject is ownership subject to the lawful demands of the sovereign, so contracts must be understood as made in reference to the possible exercise of the rightful authority of the Government, and no obligation of a contract can extend to the defeat of a legitimate Government authority.

Closely allied to this objection we have just been considering is the argument pressed upon us that the legal-tender acts were prohibited by the spirit of the fifth amendment, which forbids taking private property for public use without just compensation or due process of law. That provision has always been understood as referring only to a direct appropriation, and not to consequential injuries resulting from the exercise of lawful power. It has never been supposed to have any bearing upon or to inhibit laws that indirectly work harm and loss to individuals. A new tariff, an embargo, a draft, or a war, may inevitably bring upon individuals great losses; may, indeed, render valuable property almost valueless. They may destroy the worth of contracts. But who ever supposed that, because of this, a tariff could not be changed, or a non-intercourse act or an embargo be enacted, or a war be declared?

By the act of June 28, 1834, a new regulation of the weight and value of gold coin was adopted and about 6 per cent. was taken from the weight of each dollar. The effect of this was that all creditors were subjected to a corresponding loss. The debts then due became solvable with 6 per cent. less gold than was required to pay them before. The result was thus precisely what it is contended the legal-tender acts worked. But was it ever imagined that this was taking private property without compensation or without due process of law? Was the idea ever advanced that the new regulation of gold coin was against the spirit of the fifth amendment? And has any one in good faith avowed his belief that even a law debasing the current coin by increasing the alloy would be taking private property? It might be impolitic and unjust, but could its constitutionality be doubted?

Other statutes have, from time to time, reduced the quantity of silver in silver coin without any question of their constitutionality. It is said, however, now, that the act of 1834 only brought the legal value of gold coin more nearly into correspondence with its actual value in market, or its relative value to silver. But we do not perceive that this varies the case or diminishes its force as an illustration. The creditor who had a thousand dollars due him on the 31st day of July, 1834, (the day before the act took effect,) was entitled to a thousand dollars of coined gold of the weight and fineness of the then existing coinage. The day after, he was entitled only to a sum 6 per cent. less in weight and in market value, or to a smaller number of silver dollars. Yet he would have been a bold man who had asserted that, because of this, the obligation of the contract was impaired, or that private property was taken without compensation or without due process of law. No such assertion, so far as we know, was ever made. Admit it was a hardship but it is not every hardship that is unjust, much less that is unconstitutional; and certainly it would be an anomaly for us to hold an act of Congress invalid because we might think its provisions harsh and unjust.

We are not aware of anything else which has been advanced in support of the proposition that the legal-tender acts were forbidden by either the letter or the spirit of the Constitution. If, therefore, they were what we have endeavored to show, appropriate means for legitimate ends, they were not transgressive of the authority vested in Congress.

Here we might stop; but we will notice briefly an argument presented in support of the position that the unit of money value must possess intrinsic value. The argument is derived from assimilating the constitutional provision respecting a standard of weights and measures to that conferring the power to coin money and regulate its value.

It is said there can be no uniform standard of weights without weight, or of measure without length or space, and we are asked how anything can be made a uniform standard of value which has itself no value? This is a question foreign to the subject before us. The legal-tender acts do not attempt to make paper a standard of value; we do not rest their validity upon the assertion that their emission is coinage, or any regulation of the value of money; nor do we assert that Congress may make anything which has no value money. What we do assert is, that Congress has power to enact that the Government's promises to pay money shall be, for the time being, equivalent in value to the representative of value determined by the coinage acts, or to multiples thereof.

It is hardly correct to speak of a standard of value. The Constitution does not speak of it. It contemplates a standard for that which has gravity or extension; but value is an ideal thing. The coinage acts fix its unit as a dollar; but the gold or silver thing we call a dollar is in no sense a standard of a dollar. It is a representative of it. There might never have been a piece of money of the denomination of a dollar. There never was a pound sterling coined until 1815, if we except a few coins struck in the reign of Henry VIII, almost immediately debased, yet it has been the unit of British currency for many generations. It is, then, a mistake to regard the legal-tender acts as either fixing a standard of value or regulating money values, or making that money which has no intrinsic value.

But, without extending our remarks further, it will be seen that we hold the acts of Congress constitutional as applied to contracts made either before or after their passage. In so holding we overrule so much of what was decided in Hepburn vs. Griswold, 8 Wall., 603, as ruled the acts unwarranted by the Constitution, so far as they apply to contracts made before their enactment. That case was decided by a divided court and by a court having a less number of judges than the law then in existence provided this court shall have. These cases have been heard before a full court and they have received our most careful consideration. The questions involved are constitutional questions of the most vital importance to the Government and to the public at large.

We have been in the habit of treating cases involving a consideration of constitutional power differently from those which concern merely private right. (Briscoe vs. Bank of Kentucky, 8 Peters, 118.) We are not accustomed to hear them in the absence of a full court if it can be avoided. Even in cases involving only private rights, if convinced we had made a mistake, we would hear another argument and correct our error. And it is no unprecedented thing in courts of last resort, both in this country and in England, to overrule decisions previously made. We agree this should not be done inconsiderately, but in a case of such far-reaching consequences as the present, thoroughly convinced as we are that Congress has not transgressed its powers, we regard it as our duty so to decide and to affirm both these judgments.

Congress issued bills of credit or Treasury notes in June, 1812, in February, 1813, in 1837, in 1846, in 1857, and February 25, 1862. There is no question in relation to the constitutional right of Congress to issue bills of credit or Treasury notes at any time in the discretion of Congress, whether in time of peace or in time of war. Upon this subject we have the opinions of the ablest American statesmen. We have the decision of the United States Supreme Court, delivered in December, 1870, the highest judicial tribunal known in the civilized world. This opinion was delivered five years after the war of the rebellion, and fully established the constitutional right of Congress to issue legal-tender Treasury notes. But, in addition to all this, during peace, thirteen years after the war, we have the opinion of 177 to 35 members of this House, a majority in the Senate, and the signature of the President in May, 1878, fully committed to the legal-tender lawful money in the following language, to wit:

The bill was read. It provides that from and after the passage of this act it shall not be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury or other officer under him to cancel or retire any more of the United States legal-tender notes, and that when any of said notes may be redeemed or be received into the Treasury under any law from any source whatever, and shall belong to the United States, they shall not be retired, canceled, or destroyed, but they shall be reissued and paid out again and kept in circulation, provided that nothing therein shall prohibit the cancellation and destruction of mutilated notes and the issue of other notes of like denomination in their stead, as now provided by law, and that all acts and parts of acts in conflict with this act are hereby repealed.—Congressional Record, April 29, 1878.

We now have all this Congressional legislation and these judicial decisions during the last one hundred years to fully sustain our proposition for the issuing of legal-tender Treasury notes. It is only a question whether $250,000,000 gold and silver shall lie idle in the Treasury or be paid out to cancel bonds, stop interest, and go into the circulation as money, and whether non-interest-bearing legal-tender Treasury notes shall circulate as currency and encourage industry and enterprise, build railroads, build towns and cities, pay its just proportion of taxes, give employment to labor, make happy homes and a prosperous country, or shall the people continue to pay interest, continue in serfdom and slavery to the most ingenious system of oppression ever advocated in contempt of republican institutions and the just rights of the American people.

We said, fifteen years ago, take the robber's word "except" out of the greenback and there would be no depreciation; that it would be worth more than gold. History proves this fact. When thirty days previous to the time appointed for resumption an agreement was made with the banks to receive the legal tender for all purposes, equality was established, and no man wanted metal money. The distinguished Democratic Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] in his speech upon the Sherman funding bill, said:

We are losing $2,000,000 or $3,000,000 a year by letting this large amount of money lie idle in the Treasury. There never has been a doubt, and the country understands it now, that the greenbacks would have been as good as gold eight years ago, if they had not been persistently refused at the custom-houses. If they had been received in 1875, before you passed your resumption law, at the custom-houses, as they were received in 1879, they would have been as good as gold then, and there would have been no necessity for selling a dollar of the $95,500,000 of bonds, for which the Secretary paid 4½ per cent. in order to lay away gold to pay them with.

The Secretary of the Treasury in his report for 1879-'80, volume 13, page 9, says:

No distinction has been made since that time between coin and United States notes in the collection of duties or in the payment of the principal or interest of the public debt. The great body of coin indebtedness has been paid in United States notes at the request of creditors. The total amount of United States notes presented for redemption from January 1 to November 1, 1879, was $11,256,678. But little coin has been demanded on the coin liabilities of the Government during the same period, though the amount accruing exceeded $600,000,000. Meantime coin was freely paid into the Treasury and gold bullion was deposited in the assay office and paid for in United States notes. The aggregate gold and silver coin and bullion in the Treasury increased during that period from $167,558,734.19 to $225,133,558.72, and the net balance available for resumption increased from $133,508,804.50 to $152,737,155.48.

In accordance with the position taken in the last annual report United States notes have been received since January 1 last in payment of duties on imports.

Here we have the official report, the testimony of a Democratic Senator and a Republican Senator and ex-Secretary, conclusively showing that no metal money is wanted, that the full legal-tender paper is better, is preferred by creditors, and that there is no necessity for holding hundreds of millions of dollars for years without use, when it should stop interest.

No man wants to move tons of metal. We have paid large sums for mintage, storage, and to force the metals into circulation. Business men deposit large sums of gold and take silver certificates and Treasury notes in preference. We have sold a large amount of interest-bearing bonds to purchase gold to lie idle in the Treasury.

A distinguished Senator from Delaware recently advocated such ridiculous absurdity in these words:

Now, sir, all must admit, the superior convenience of paper money as compared with real money, metallic coins; but to make such a system endurable it must be absolutely and instantly convertible at the will of the holder into real money, into coin of the standard value.

The United States Supreme Court answers such absurd sophistry, in regard to metal money. The Supreme Court says:

It is hardly correct to speak of a standard of value. Value is an ideal thing. The gold and silver thing we call a dollar is in no sense a standard of a dollar. It is a representative of it. Indeed, legal-tender Treasury notes have become the universal measure of values. Making the notes legal tenders gave them a new use, and it needs no argument to show that the value of things is in proportion to the uses to which they may be applied.

The language of the Supreme Court settles the whole question. This decision also determines what caused the equality of the greenback with gold. It was making it receivable for import duties and all other purposes the same as gold. The piling of the metals in the Treasury had nothing to do with it. The $60,000,000 of legal-tenders first issued during the late war, when made legal tender for import duties and other purposes the same as gold, were worth more than gold until the present hour. The legal-tender paper money is made "instantly" redeemable in all the commodities of commerce.

The sovereign law power requires all creditors to receive the same in payment of all debts. There are no other uses for any money. The political economist whose Senatorial vision appears to be limited to a State smaller in territory and population than many of our Western Congressional districts says:

To make such system [of paper money] endurable it must be absolutely and instantly convertible at the will of the holder into real money, into coin of the standard value.

The distinguished Senator seems to overlook the fact that the supreme law makes the legal tenders "absolutely and instantly convertible" into all commodities without the necessity of purchasing at the great expense of hundreds of millions of dollars and holding without use any single commodity. Such language is contempt of government, and was only used by Tories during the American Revolution and by the enemies of the Government during the late war. It would be ludicrous, if it were not morally criminal, to deceive and unnecessarily and unjustly tax the American people. The producers of wealth and the tax-payers have lost annually hundreds of millions of dollars because of this stupid ignorance and barbarous absurdity and unlimited fraud called "specie basis."

We have now used the legal-tender currency during the last twenty years. It has performed all the functions of money. The people prefer it to any other. In 1870 the Supreme Court declared that the legal-tender Treasury notes had become the universal measure of values. Twelve years have elapsed since that decision; the people have become accustomed to its use; it is worth more than gold not only in this country but in other civilized nations. The people have learned their constitutional rights: to have a legal-tender paper currency, "to regulate commerce, to establish justice, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity."

The objection to a specie basis is the same as that to specie alone, the impossibility of obtaining a sufficient quantity for a currency. If it could be kept uniform, and gradually increase in the proportion of increased wealth, commerce, population, and production, the principal objection then would be the unnecessary cost of material, its weight, and loss by wearing. But its supply depends on the mere chance discovery of metal, and this supply failing in Europe was the chief cause of the decline and fall of the Roman Empire, and the periodical panics of all nations. Its amount in the country at any one time depends on not only the supply from the mines, which is uncertain, but also upon the demand for foreign exportation.

Suppose we had a paper based on specie; a war on the continent of Europe would create a demand for the specie, and the commodity on which our currency would be based might be removed. The paper would have no adequate basis and a crisis would be the result. This was the case in England in 1819, 1825, 1831, 1837, 1839, 1847, 1857, and 1866. Is it not better to base our currency on something that we can keep at home; at least something less desirable to foreign countries. Again, a paper based on specie would increase as the specie increased and decrease with its scarcity, which is the fruitful source of panics, crises, general want of confidence, bankruptcy, and ruin.

The contraction in England in 1838 of $40,000,000 and in 1839 of $5,000,000 caused their great panic there of 1839 and 1840, and bankruptcies doubled and the stagnation was most disastrous to the laboring classes, who were thus thrown out of employment. The historian Alison, speaking of this period, says, of interest on money, (volume 6, chapter 37,) "it raised by the 1st of August, 1839, to 6 per cent. from 3½ per cent., which it had been the year before. The great advance in the interest paid for money diminished the profits of trade." A great fall in the price of all articles of commerce was ruinous to the trades and in a high degree disastrous to the laboring classes. The bankruptcies, which had been very frequent ever since the abolition of small notes and consequent limitation of bank accommodation, became numerous in 1839 and 1840, nearly double what they had been five years before. The number of paupers increased in frightful progression, insomuch that in the year 1840 they amounted to 1,721,000 of a population at that period not exceeding 16,000,000, showing that more than one-ninth of the whole population had become recipients of public charity. At the same time the paupers in Ireland were 2,285,000 and in Scotland 85,000, making a total of 4,081,000 in the British Islands.

Alison, in his History of Europe, (volume 6, chapter 35,) says:

In every one of the great monetary crises which have occurred every five or six years during the past thirty years from $500,000,000 to $750,000,000 have been destroyed.

Is the retention of gold worth purchasing at such a price? What is the use of it if it can only be retained by making the capitalists richer and all other classes poorer? In the next place, the experience of Great Britain during the French war demonstrates that by means of an adequate paper currency not only can calamity be averted but the highest degree of prosperity and national glory can be attained without any gold. To put this domestic currency on a proper footing it is indispensable that it should be issued by the government, and government only, and on the national security, and that every banker who chooses to deal in notes should not be permitted to usurp the king's prerogative and issue the current coin of the realm. And it may safely be affirmed that if the requisite change is not made the nation will continue to be visited every four or five years by a periodical calamity which will destroy all the fruits of former prosperity.

A specie-basis system is to the nation what the inhuman military laws of past ages were to the poor culprit who was condemned to receive his thousand lashes, brought out at successive times to receive a hundred, then wait for the wounds to heal before receiving the next round.

Speaking of contraction of the currency in the Roman Empire, Alison, in his History of Europe, volume 2, page 381, says:

The supplies of specie for the Old World became inadequate to the increasing wants of its population when the power of the emperors had given lasting internal peace to its hundred and twenty millions of inhabitants. The mines of Spain and Greece, from which the chief supplies were obtained at that period, were worked out or became unworkable from the exactions of the emperors; and so great was the dearth of the precious metals which thence ensued that the treasure in circulation in the empire, which in the time of Augustus amounted to $1,800,000,000, had sunk in that of Justinian to $400,000,000; and the golden aureus, which in the days of the Antonines weighed 118 grains, had come, in the fifth century, to weigh only 68, though it was only taken in discharge of debts and taxes at its original and standard value. As a necessary consequence of so prodigious a contraction of the currency, without any proportional diminution in the numbers or transactions of mankind, debts and taxes, which were all measured in the old standard, became so overwhelming that the national industry was ruined; agriculture disappeared, and was succeeded by pasturage in the fields; the great cities were all fed from Egypt and Libya; the revenue became irrecoverable; the legions dwindled into cohorts, the cohorts into companies; and the six hundred thousand men who guarded the frontiers of the empire in the time of Augustus had sunk to one hundred and fifty thousand in that of Justinian, a force wholly inadequate to its defense.

From the report of the silver commission, second session Forty-fourth Congress, page 49, we get the following:

By the end of the fifteenth century the currency had shrunk to less than $200,000,000. During this period a most extraordinary and baneful change took place in the condition of the world. Population dwindled, and commerce, arts, wealth, and freedom all disappeared. The people were reduced by poverty and misery to the most degraded conditions of serfdom and slavery. The disintegration of society was almost complete. The conditions of life were so hard that individual selfishness was the only thing consistent with the instinct of self-preservation. All public spirit, all generous emotions, all the noble aspirations of man shriveled and disappeared as the volume of money shrunk and as prices fell.

History records no such disastrous transition as that from the Roman Empire to the Dark Ages. Various explanations have been given of this entire breaking down of the frame-work of society, but it was certainly coincident with a shrinkage in the volume of money, which was also without historical parallel. The crumbling of institutions kept even step and pace with the shrinkage in the stock of money and the falling of prices. All other attendant circumstances than these last have occurred in other historical periods unaccompanied and unfollowed by any such mighty disasters.

It is a suggestive coincidence that the first glimmer of light only came with the invention of bills of exchange and paper substitutes, through which the scanty stock of the precious metals was increased in efficiency. But not less than the energizing influence of Potosi and all the argosies of treasure from the New World were needed to arouse the Old World from its comatose sleep, to quicken the torpid limbs of industry, and to plume the leaden wings of commerce. It needed the heroic treatment of rising prices to enable society to reunite its shattered links, to shake off the shackles of feudalism, to relight and uplift the almost extinguished torch of civilization. That the disasters of the Dark Ages were caused by decreasing money and falling prices, and that the recovery therefrom and the comparative prosperity which followed the discovery of America were due to an increasing supply of the precious metals and rising prices, will not seem surprising or unreasonable when the noble functions of money are considered.

Money is the great instrument of association, the very fiber of social organism, the vitalizing force of industry; the protoplasm of civilization, and as essential to its existence as oxygen is to animal life. Without money civilization could not have had a beginning; with a diminishing supply it must languish, and, unless relieved, finally perish. Symptoms of disasters similar to those which befel society during the Dark Ages were observable on every hand during the first half of this century.

In 1809 the revolutionary troubles between Spain and her American colonies broke out. These troubles resulted in a great diminution in the production of the precious metals, which was quickly indicated by a fall in general prices.

As already stated in this report, it is estimated that the purchasing power of the precious metals increased between 1809 and 1848 fully 145 per cent., or, in other words, that the general range of prices was 60 per cent. lower in 1848 than it was in 1809. During this period there was no general demonetization of either metal and no important fluctuation in the relative value of the metals, and the supply was sufficient to keep their stock good against losses by accident and abrasion. But it was insufficient to keep the stock up to the proper correspondence with the increasing demand of advancing populations. The world has rarely passed through a more gloomy period than this one. Again do we find falling prices and misery and destitution inseparable companions. The poverty and distress of the industrial masses were intense and universal, and since the discovery of the mines of America without a parallel.

In England the sufferings of the people found expression in demands upon Parliament for relief in bread riots and in immense chartist demonstrations. The military arm of the nation had to be strengthened to prevent the all-pervading discontent from ripening into open revolt. On the Continent the fires of revolution smoldered everywhere, and blazed out at many points, threatening the overthrow of states and the subversion of social institutions. Whenever and wherever the mutterings of discontent were hushed by the fear of increased standing armies the foundations of society were honeycombed by powerful secret political associations.

The cause at work to produce this state of things was so subtle, and the advance so silent, that the masses were entirely ignorant of its nature. They had come to regard money as an institution fixed and immovable in value, and when the price of property and the wages of labor fell they charged the fault not to the money but to the property and the employer. They were taught that the mischief was the result of overproduction. Never having observed that overproduction was complained of only when the money stock was decreasing, their prejudices were aroused against labor-saving machinery. They were angered at capital because it either declined altogether to embark in industrial enterprises or would only embark in them upon the condition of employing labor at the most scanty remuneration. They forgot that falling prices compelled capital to avoid such enterprises on any other condition, and for the most part to avoid them entirely. They did not comprehend that money in shrinking volume was the prolific parent of enforced idleness and poverty, and that falling prices divorced money, capital, and labor, but they none the less felt the shrinking metallic shroud that was closing around industry.

The increased yield of the Russian gold fields in 1846 gave some relief and served as a parachute to the fall in prices, which might otherwise have resulted in a great catastrophe. But the enormous metallic supplies of California and Australia were all needed to give substantial and adequate relief. Great as these supplies were.

their influence in raising prices was moderated and soon entirely arrested by the increasing populations and commerce which followed them. In the twenty-five years between 1850 and 1876 the money stock of the world was more than doubled, and yet at no time during this period was the general level of prices raised more than 18 per cent. above the general level in 1848. A comparison of this effect of an increasing volume of money after 1848 with the effect of a decreasing volume between 1809 and 1848 strikingly illustrates how largely different in degree is the influence upon prices of an increasing or decreasing volume of money. The decrease of the yield of the mines since about 1865, while population and commerce have been advancing, has already produced unmistakable symptoms of the same general distrust, non-employment of labor, and political and social disquiet, which have characterized all former periods of shrinking money.

It is a fact well established by the history of nations, that an increase of currency, well founded, always has and will cause prosperity for the laboring, manufacturing, mercantile, and producing industries of the country. And it is equally true that a contraction of the currency always has and always will cause high rates of interest and prostration of business; thereby causing universal bankruptcy, pauperism, ignorance and crime, human suffering and hard times.

During the panic of 1793, in England, William Pitt had the paper currency increased $25,000,000. It stopped the panic and gave prosperity to the country. The drain of the money from England to carry on her Napoleonic wars threatened to ruin the kingdom, and on February 25, 1797, the Parliament of England authorized the Bank of England to suspend specie payments and to issue its bills without limit, and as legal tenders, and pursuant to this law the increase of $50,000,000, stayed the panic and gave prosperity.

In 1811, when there was scarcely a metallic sovereign left in England, and 30 per cent. was paid to obtain coin to carry on its peninsular war, it again increased its legal-tender paper currency $75,000,000. This increase of currency to about $135,000,000 in 1815 revived all the industries of the country. Alison in his History of Europe speaks of the unparalleled prosperity it caused. This currency was increased on the suspension of specie again in 1817 and 1818, and the paper currency in England reached $241,390,350. Of this period the historian speaks as follows:

The paper circulation of Great Britain had increased during the drain of the metals and compensated for their want. In 1818 the currency reached $240,000,000 in England alone, a larger amount than in any previous year of the war. Hence the prosperity in this country which coexisted with the most serious pressure and distress on the Continent.—Alison's History of Europe, volume 1, pages 395–397.

The great paper currency guaranteed by all the allied powers, issued so plentifully during 1813 and 1814, and which had circulated as cash from the banks of the Rhine to the Wall of China, gave great prosperity to the whole country until 1817 and 1818, the period of contraction on the Continent.

The hard times on the Continent during 1817 and 1818, caused by contraction of the currency, during the same period that England was enjoying prosperity caused by inflation of the currency, is another of the many lessons of history showing the power of government to cause prosperity by inflation and to cause hard times by contraction.

Alison, in his History of Europe, says:

The contraction of the currency in England in 1819 to 1826 caused fearful suffering. It was a woful spectacle to see the streets of Manchester and the chief towns in its vicinity filled with vast crowds, sometimes 10,000 in number, whose wan visages and lean figures but too clearly told the tale of their sufferings, snatching their food from bakers' shops.

The legislation causing a contraction of the currency reduced the wages of laboring-men one-half. Yet the party in power declared that the hard times in England was caused by extravagant speculation. The historian says:

This affords an example of the ease with which a powerful party can succeed in deluding the public mind and conducting a nation amidst universal applause to the very measures most destructive to its prosperity.

That English historian continues:

The British Empire in the whole of 1818 and commencement of 1819 was beginning to taste the fruits of peace and prosperity; and industry revived, and supported by a currency at once adequate and duly limited, was flourishing in all its branches, and daily discovering new channels of profit and enterprise, at the very time when the scarcity of money on the Continent was involving all classes in unheard of distress.

But this flattering prospect was of short duration. Great Britain was soon doomed to experience in all its bitterness the disastrous effects of an ill-judged act of legislation, to prostrate all of her industries. Does not wise or unwise legislation make or destroy a nation's prosperity? At that period England required an increased currency to continue her prosperity, but the Parliament of England in 1819 required the Bank of England to resume specie payments. The industries of the nation, then so prosperous, were speedily congealed like the flowing stream by the severity of an Arctic winter. The circulation fell $35,000,000 during 1819, and "distrust and discouragement was felt in every branch of industry." In the next two years they contracted the circulation $75,000,000 more, and the historian paints the disastrous condition and fearful suffering of the people of England.

Between 1818 and 1821 the paper of England was contracted from $240,000,000 to $150,000,000, or $90,000,000, and the exports and imports lessened, as all business declined and laboring-men could find no employment. The following tables from Alison's History of Europe, volume 2, page 399, will show the decrease of currency from 1818 to 1822, (Tooke on Prices, 2, 129:)

BANK AND BANKERS' NOTES.

The following table (Alison's History of Europe, volume 2, page 400) shows the decline in prices of the products of labor from 1818 to 1822:

Year.	Wheat, per qr.	Cotton, per lb.	Iron, per ton.	Rice, per ton.	Silk, per lb.	Tea, per lb.	Wool, per lb.	Sugar, per cwt.	Beef, per tierce.

The following table from Alison's Europe, chapter 97, appendix, shows the depressed condition of the industries by the falling off of exports, and the destitution of the people by the falling off of their imports:

Year.	Exports—declared value.	Imports.
1818	£45,180,150	£35,845,340
1819	34,252,251	29,681,640
1820	35,569,677	31,515,222
1821	35,823,127	29,769,122
1822	36,176,897	29,432,376

Mr. Vansistart gave the following table in his report to the Parliament of England in 1811, to show the necessity of a further increase of paper currency, which was adopted. He said:

The amount of currency must bear a proportion to the amount of trade, public revenue, and expenditure. The average value of exports and imports, revenues and expenditures, and bank-notes of Great Britain, for three years previous to 1797 stood thus, (official value:)

Imports and exports, average of three years	$263,760,000
Revenues, including loans	185,000,000
Expenditures	214,000,000
Bank notes in circulation	53,410,000

The same average for three years, ending January 5, 1811, was as follows:

Imports and exports	$389,955,000
Revenue and loans	365,500,000
Expenditures	411,025,000
Bank notes in circulation	97,745,900

These figures show the same fact as the others, that with an average of nearly double the paper money in the country for each period of three years, it nearly doubled its business as a nation.

It was by adopting the theory of Vansistart to increase the paper money that England was successful in war and prosperous in peace. Our country was prosperous in war by the adoption of the same theory. By the adoption of the theory of bullionists in 1819 in England riots were caused by hungry men seeking employment and bread. The contraction policy in this country from 1865 to 1878 placed the debtor classes at the mercy of Shylocks by shrinking values, thereby doubling the indebtedness, discouraging industry, filling the land with bankrupts, paupers, tramps, and criminals. It stopped the building of railroads; it stopped the tide of immigration; it cursed all the States with hard times; it forced hundreds of thousands of able-bodied men to beg for work and for bread; it caused labor strikes, riots, and destruction of property. A land blessed with bountiful harvests was filled with unrest, the deepest gloom, and sadness.

The following table from Poore's Railroad Manual for 1880 shows that the building of railroads and employment of men corresponded to the inflation and contraction of the currency in this country:

Year.	Miles in operation at the end of each year.	Miles constructed each year.
1871	60,293	7,379
1872	66,171	5,878
1873	70,278	4,107
1874	72,383	2,105
1875	74,096	1,713
1876	76,808	2,712
1877	79,089	2,281
1878	81,776	2,687
1879	86,497	4,721
1880	97,671	8,174
1881	102,913	8,242

There was an increase of currency from January 1, 1879, to November 1, 1881, of $400,274,983.

It will be seen that when our currency was contracted in 1875 we built only 1,713 miles of railroad, yet after the remonetization of silver in 1878, and ordering $346,681,016 of legal-tender paper money to be continued in the circulation, with also a large increase in bank currency and in gold and silver, there was a corresponding increase in the building of railroads.

Some people speak of gold and silver as money of the world. This is an absurdity based upon ignorance. There never was any such thing as money of the world.

The following table shows the different nations using gold and silver. Some use no gold, some no silver, as currency. Each nation has its peculiar method of coinage not common to others. Nearly all of these nations use mostly a paper currency. About 97 per cent. of all currency is paper; therefore, if it were possible to speak of money of the world, the nearest approach to such money would be paper. The United States received $110,575,497 of metal money and bullion during the year 1881 from other nations. Of this sum $9,419,872 was American coin, and $101,155,625 was foreign coin and bullion. Nearly all of the foreign coin and bullion were melted and stamped as American coin. Our coin taken to other nations is weighed and taken at its commodity or commercial value, the same as wheat. Our bars of gold are frequently worth a premium over our coin in European cities.

The countries using metal money in 1870 were as follows, (Jones's Resumption and the Double Standard, page 111:)

	Population.
In 1870, those using both gold and silver:
United States	39,000,000
France	36,000,000
Italy	26,000,000
Spain	17,000,000
Belgium	5,000,000
Switzerland	3,500,000
Greece	1,500,000
Peru	4,000,000
New Granada	3,000,000
Ecuador	1,000,000
Those using silver alone:
India	200,000,000
China	250,000,000
Russia	82,000,000
Germany	41,000,000
Austria	36,000,000
Mexico	9,000,000
Sweden and Norway	6,000,000
Denmark	2,000,000
Holland	4,000,000
Central America	2,500,000
Countries using gold alone:
United Kingdom	31,000,000
Turkey	36,000,000
Brazil	10,000,000
Portugal	4,000,000
Chili	2,000,000
Australia	2,000,000

The following table shows the amount of gold and silver coin and bullion in the United States mints and New York assay office was $128,006,188.21. (See report, pages 36, 38, 30, of the Director of the Mint, 1881.)

Coinage executed during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1881:

Gold coins	$78,733,864 00
Silver coins	27,649,967 75
Five cents, three cents, one-cent pieces	405,109 95
Total coinage	106,788,940 70

The following statement shows the expenditures of the United States mints and assay offices for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1881:

Salaries of officers and clerks	$159,765 02
Wages of workmen	809,636 62
Contingent expenses not including wastage and loss on sweeps	287,869 69
Parting and refining expenses	268,256 75
Expense of distributing standard silver dollars	90,476 38
Wastage of operative offices	45,343 98
Loss on sale of sweeps	22,926 17
Expense of distributing minor coins	23,763 46
Loss on bullion shipped to the Mint for coinage	23 85
Total expenditures	1,708,161 92

There were coined at the Carson mint during the year previous to June 30, 1881, 592,189 pieces, valued at $883,590; expenditures, $131,037.03; average cost of coinage at that mint during the year, twenty-two cents and one mill for each piece coined.

Bill passed the House February 19, 1882, appropriating for constructing, repairing, enlarging, and renting vaults and safes for the use of the Treasurer and assistant treasurer of the United States, $75,000.

All these unnecessary expenditures, together with the commodity value of the metals used, would be saved to the people by using the legal-tender paper currency. We would save the expense of purchasing metals, of coining, of the loss of wear, and expense of distribution, if we were to use legal-tender fractional paper currency. Is not the paper more convenient in use, and, redeemed when worn by new issues, more desirable than fractional silver? We have paid 5 per cent. interest on $50,000,000 of bonds since 1876 to purchase silver to force upon the people in place of the paper fractional currency.

The above table shows that the people paid $90,476.38 for distributing standard silver dollars within the year previous to June 30, 1881. It also shows that the people paid $23,763.46 for distributing minor coins during the same year. These are expenditures in addition to the interest paid annually upon the bonds used to purchase the silver bullion. Will some specie-basis banker who must have what he calls "real money" please rise and tell the American people how much money was ever paid for coinage, for interest, and for distribution upon the legal-tender paper dollars and fractional paper currency? Will the bullionists please explain why it is so difficult and expensive to get this (so-called) world's money into circulation? Why the people are taxed to pay for safes and storage for this gold and silver money which the people make haste to deposit in exchange for paper?

Principal and interest of the public debt from 1873 to 1880.

NATIONAL-BANK CIRCULATION.

January 14, 1875	$351,861,450
May 31, 1878	322,555,965
Contraction	29,305,485
Amount legal tender January 14, 1875	382,000,000
On May 31, 1878	346,684,016
Contraction from January 14, 1875, to May 31, 1878	35,318,984
Contraction of paper currency in two years and five months	64,624,469

(See Comptroller's report, 1881, page 146.)

The above tables show that under the deceptive pretense of specie resumption our specie-basis financiers contracted the legal-tender currency $35,318,984 during the three years from 1875 to 1878. The national banks contracted their circulation $29,305,485 during the same period. The national interest-bearing debt was increased $72,000,000 during the same period. All this contraction of the currency and increase of the interest-bearing debt was made while there was a continual increase of population, and the people were suffering hard times caused by previous contraction of paper money and the demonetization of silver. Who shall be held responsible for this specie-basis absurdity, this pagan idolatry which annually robs the people of millions of dollars called interest, and withholds from the circulation hundreds of millions, the life-blood of industry?

The above table shows the increase of the total interest-bearing debt from 1873 to 1880 to be $13,509,150. The table also shows the hundreds of millions of dollars held out of the circulation during seven years, while the people were suffering hard times for the want of that money and paying millions of dollars of unnecessary interest upon the bonds. The Secretary of the Treasury in his annual report, November 1, 1881, says the amount of outstanding bonds bearing 3½ per cent. interest, payable at the pleasure of the Government, is $563,380,950. The Secretary also reports cash in the Treasury, $249,363,415. The Director of the Mint reports $128,006,188 at the mints and assay offices in coin and bullion.

We have coined a portion of that material into money; the remainder we hold in bars ready for the commerce of barbarous nations. It is our right to use these accumulated metals to stop interest upon bonds. They are adapted to the intelligence and demands of the bondholders of 1869; make them take the metal or legal-tender paper, and stop interest. Give the creditor the option of metal or the legal-tender non-interest-bearing paper, and we have such confidence in their intelligence and civilization that we have no doubt that our interest-bearing debt would be paid, with as many millions of gold and silver dollars left in the Treasury as at the present hour.

CONTRACTION IN THE UNITED STATES.

The silver commission, composed equally of Democrats and Republicans, and presided over by a distinguished Republican Senator, Mr. JONES, of Nevada, say concerning the effect of this contraction, on page 59 of their report:

If all the debts in this country had been doubled by an act of legislation, it would have been a far less calamity to the debtor and to the country than the increase in their real burden already caused by a contraction in the volume of money. And infinitely more disastrous in every sense than an unjust increase in the burden of debt is the universal stagnation of industry and commerce, resulting from the same cause.

Senator SHERMAN, on the 27th of January, 1869, predicted this very result in the following language:

It is not possible to take this voyage [of contraction] without the sorest distress to every person except a capitalist out of debt, or a salaried officer or annuitant; it is a period of loss, danger, lassitude of trade, fall of wages, suspension of enterprise, bankruptcy, and disaster.

Silver commission, pages 25, 10, 115, 35, 187, 4, volume 2, for 1876–'7:

A shrinking volume of money and falling prices always have had and always must have a tendency to concentrate wealth, to enrich the few, and to impoverish and degrade the many. This tendency is subtle, active, and portentous throughout the world to-day. * * * An increasing value of money and falling prices have been and are more fruitful of human misery than war, pestilence, or famine. They have wrought more injustice than all the bad laws which were ever enacted. * * * It is one of the admitted advantages of our present system of irredeemable paper that it shelters us from the recurring demands for gold by the Bank of England. * * * Nothing can be more certain than that the production of the precious metals bears no scientific relation to the increase or decrease of population or commerce, which alone should govern the increase or decrease of the stock of money. * * * If Congress can demonetize silver it can demonetize gold, or both gold and silver, and can monetize any substance or any form of paper. Narrowing money to gold is for the intended although really doubtful advantage of creditors, but they have more to lose than to gain by affirming a power which can so easily be used in a different direction and to their ruin. * * * Manifestly the real reason for the demonetization of silver was the apprehension of the creditor classes that the combined production of the two metals would raise prices and cheapen money unless one of them was shorn of the money function. In Europe this reason was distinctly avowed.

The silver commission of the second session of the Forty-fourth Congress, page 55, says:

When the money stock is diminishing and prices are falling the lender not only receives interest but finds a profit in the greatly increased value of the principal when it is returned to him. A loan of money made in 1809, if repaid in 1848, would have been repaid with an addition of 145 per cent. in the purchasing power of principal and interest besides all the interest paid. Those who have loaned money to this Government since 1861 have already received nearly as much in the increased value of their principal as in interest; and all the probabilities are, in respect to the 4 per cent. thirty-year national bonds now being negotiated, if they are redeemed in gold, that more profit will be made by the augmentation in the value of principal than through interest. Indeed the signs of the times are that the bonds of a country possessing the unbounded resources and staple institutions of the United States payable in gold at the end of thirty years without any interest whatever would, through the increase of the value of that metal, prove a most profitable investment.

EFFECTS OF A SHRINKING VOLUME OF MONEY ON PRODUCTIVE INDUSTRY.

The worst effects, however, economically considered, of falling prices is not upon existing property nor upon debtors, evil as it is, but upon laborers whom it deprives of employment and consigns to poverty, and upon society, which it deprives of that vast sum of wealth which resides potentially in the vigorous arms of the idle workman. A shrinking volume of money transfers existing property unjustly and causes a concentration and diminution of wealth.

It also impairs the value of existing property by eliminating from it that important element of value conferred upon it by the skill, energy, and care of the debtors from whom it is wrested. But it does not destroy any existing property, while it does absolutely annihilate all the values producible by the labor which it condemns to idleness. The estimate is not an extravagant one that there are now in the United States three million persons willing to work, but who are idle because they cannot obtain employment. This vast poverty-stricken army is increasing and will continue to increase as long as falling prices shall continue to separate money capital, the fund out of which wages is paid, from labor, and to discourage its investment in other forms of property. Under the false pretense that the legal-tender money depreciated because of the amount in circulation, the specie-basis doctors enacted a law in 1865 providing for the contraction of the currency, which caused a contraction in three years of $372,354,779, according to the Treasurer's report in 1868.

President Grant, in his message of December, 1873, said:

During the last four years, (from 1869 to 1873) the currency has been contracted by the withdrawal of the 3 per cent. certificates, compound-interest notes, 7-30 bonds, outstanding on the 4th of March, 1869, all of which took the place of legal tenders in the bank reserves to the extent of $630,000,000.

We have had a history of shrinkage of values and universal paralyzation of industry, of hard times, of bankruptcy, pauperism, fearful suffering and crime, similar to that of all other nations, when metal-money idolaters, usurers, and Shylocks have contracted the currency in the interest of the few to rob the many.

The mercantile agency reports show the number of failures in business in the United States increased in proportion to the shrinkage of the currency. In 1865, with the most liberal currency, at the close of the late war, we only had 540 failures, with liabilities equal only to $8,579,000. The number of failures increased annually with the shrinkage of the currency. In 1868 there were 2,608 failures; in 1869, 2,733 failures; in 1870, 3,551 failures; in 1872, 4,060 failures; in 1873, 5,183 failures; in 1874, 5,830 failures; in 1875, 7,740 failures; and in 1878 there were about 10,000 failures, with liabilities of $234,000,000. The extensive railroad strikes; the riots at Pittsburgh, Chicago, Saint Louis, and other large cities; the universal suffering and unrest among the people; the organization of the laboring classes to discuss the great subjects of taxation, transportation, and finance, and to learn why the wealth-producers were struggling under mortgages upon their homes, paying high rates of interest, deprived of the comforts of life, while the number of millionaire money-speculators were increasing in the Eastern cities, all these influences, together with the organization of a new political party, called the attention of Congress to the fact that the people were becoming too intelligent to be made slaves under the pusillanimous pretense of contracting the currency to establish specie resumption.

During a period of years previous to contraction the people had been prosperous without gold or silver. They had learned too much to again submit quietly to the sham pretenses of bankers and specie-basis schemes.

In 1878 Congressmen began to read the handwriting upon the wall. They stopped the destruction of the people's money, upon which they were paying no interest to bankers. They remonetized silver in spite of the wonderful wisdom of the Secretary of the Treasury and the veto of the President; they began to increase the currency, and there has been a corresponding prosperity since 1878. The education of the people has caused more favorable legislation for the industrial classes of the country. The people discovered that hard times were caused by unjust laws.

David Hume, in his correspondence with the Abbé Morellet, said:

In our colony of Pennsylvania the land itself, which is the chief commodity, is coined and passes into circulation. A planter immediately on purchasing land can go to a public office and receive notes to the amount of half the value of his land which notes he employs in all payments, and they circulate through the colony by convention. To prevent the public being overwhelmed by this representative money there are two means employed: first, the notes issued to any one planter must not exceed a certain sum, whatever may be the value of the land; secondly, every planter is obliged to pay back into the public office every year one-tenth of his notes. The whole is, of course, annihilated in ten years, after which it is again allowed him to take out new notes to half the value of his land.

This was the monetary system under which the American colonists prospered to such an extent that Burke said of them, "Nothing in the history of the world is like their progress." It was a wise and beneficial system, and its effects were most conducive to the happiness of the people. Take the case of a family, industrious and enterprising, driven by persecution or misfortune to seek a refuge in the wilds of the New World. With their scanty means they purchased a tract of land. Many years of hard labor, privation, and anxiety would have been necessary to bring that family into a state of decent competency had they been required to purchase gold and silver by labor and by the produce of labor before they could effect other improvements of their property. But half the value of his land was advanced to the head of the family in notes, which circulated as money. With these notes he could hire labor and purchase implements of husbandry and cattle, and thus where without these notes one acre could be cleared, cultivated, and stocked in a year, ten would, by the assistance of the paper money advanced, be reclaimed from the forest and rendered productive.

Thus hope entered the dwelling of the poor emigrant. Ten years found him with the whole of his debt to government discharged, the proprietor of a happy home; and the kind hand of a paternal government was stretched out still to advance to him again one-half of the increased value of his land, and thus enable him to clear more of the forest and to settle his children in new homes. Such was the system by which a people called by the British "a set of miserable outcasts" were converted in a short space of time into happy, contented, and prosperous colonists.

A prosperous people are generally well satisfied with the form of government under which they live. When, in 1776, Dr. Franklin was examined before a committee of the whole House of Commons, he was asked, "What was the temper of America toward Great Britain before 1773?" He answered, "The best in the world. They submitted willingly to the government of the Crown, and paid in all their courts obedience to acts of Parliament. Numerous as the people are in the several old provinces, they cost you nothing in forts, citadels, garrisons, or armies to keep them in subjection. They were governed by this country at the expense only of a little pen, ink, and paper. They were led by a thread. They had not only a regard but an affection for Great Britain, for its laws, its customs, its manners, and even a fondness for its fashions that greatly increased its commerce. Natives of Britain were always treated with particular regard; and to be an Old England man was of itself a character of some respect, and gave a kind of rank among us."

The British Government took away from America its representative money, commanded that no more paper bills of credit should be issued, that they should cease to be a legal tender, and collected the taxes in silver. This was in 1773. Now mark the consequences. This contraction of the circulating medium paralyzed all the industrial energies of the people. Ruin seized upon these once flourishing colonies; the most severe distress was brought home to every interest and every family; discontent was urged on to desperation, till at last "human nature arose and asserted its rights." In 1775 the American Congress first met in Philadelphia; in 1776 America became an independent state.

The paper currency of the colonies, issued by the people in the interest of the whole people instead of a few conspirators, laid the foundation of great prosperity, and eventually gave birth to the great American Republic. The immense population of the Chinese Empire has used a similar paper currency for the last thousand years. The currency of the Venetian Republic was also based upon the credit of the people. Let the gold idolaters who teach that paper money "must be instantly redeemable in the single commodity of gold" learn from the history of the Venetian Republic that, during a period of several hundred years, the credits of that people, without any specie basis, were worth 20 per cent. more than the purest gold.

VENETIAN MONEY.

The historian says:

In 1171 the Republic of Venice was engaged in one of the periodical contests with the Emperor of Germany, Frederic I, otherwise known as Frederic Barbarossa, and at the same time it had to equip a fleet against the Emperor of Greece. Rich as the republic was, it now stood sorely in need of money. After much deliberation in the Council of Ten, as to the best way of raising the necessary funds, it was determined to levy a forced loan upon its most opulent citizens. The money thus collected was used to stock a bank, called the Bank of Venice, each contributor becoming a shareholder and entitled to a 4 per cent. annual dividend on his loan to the state. These forced loans were entered in a book; and as, in course of time, some contributors found themselves pressed for money, they proposed to transfer to their creditors their credits on the books of the bank in lieu of money payment. In this way such transfers gradually became recognized as a very convenient way of settling accounts; and this facility of transfer, coupled with the security, guaranteed by the power and wealth of the republic, led to a very rapid circulation of the loan. Gradually all the chief merchants and capitalists of Venice desired to have a share of it. The subsequent operations of Banco Del Giro of Venice, as a means of interchange, are thus described by Mr. Colwell, page 295:

"If there were a thousand accounts opened in the bank by the chief men of trade in Venice they would be all paying as well as receiving, and the sums to be paid would be mainly to each other. There would, therefore, be a vast sum in the aggregate, payable yearly by persons in Venice to persons in Venice. If the whole number of such persons be taken by conjecture, as above, at a thousand, then nearly the whole sum owing by them would be receivable by all of them.

"It would, to a large extent, be a mutual debt among the thousand, each one having to pay to others not far from the same amount he receives. If the whole sum to be paid and received annually was a hundred and twenty millions the monthly payment would be ten millions, and the daily over three hundred thousand. The amount of bank funds which would be sufficient to meet such a daily, monthly, or yearly aggregate, experience and time alone could teach. It would depend on the rapidity of the movement, or the regularity with which the paper matured; on the degree of confidence subsisting among the parties which would lead them to favor each other by short loans, &c. The whole fund of the bank would thus move in a circle among its customers, each one receiving and paying yearly according to the extent of his business."

There was, however, another element of dissatisfaction with metallic money or coin which must be mentioned in this connection, and which contributed greatly to the popularity not only of the Bank of Venice but of all the other banks that subsequently arose and followed in its footsteps, though more or less enlarging its original functions. This element of dissatisfaction was that the difficulties encountered in the use of coins had become too great and manifold for endurance. Robbery, shipwrecks, and piracy threatened the possessor of coin in every way. Besides, there was the secret and nefarious practice of abstracting from the value of the coins by plugging, gutting, and sweating, not to mention the art of counterfeiting, which had an easy time of it with metallic coins. But, worse than all, there was inexorable time, subject to no arrest, indictment, or punishment, which deteriorated those coins within a few years from 10 to 20 per cent. by their mere use as a circulating medium, and thus destroyed their legal-tender quality.

Paper transfers were attended by no such risks. If in the shape of checks or bills of exchange, they could easily be concealed so as to escape the eye of the most practiced thief, and if they were payable to the order of the holder, they could not be stolen and transferred without his indorsement. Time could not touch them and deprive them of their original value; for if worn out they could be replaced, and if burnt or sunk in the seas, they could be reissued. Nor was it an easy matter to clip paper money profitably; and as for counterfeiting, it is a well known fact that a well-engraved bank note is far more safe against it than the purest gold or silver coins. The best coin counterfeits ever made in this country were of the old Mexican dollars, which were of unusual silver purity. This is the reason why in China the use of coins, except when weighed by Government officials, is altogether prohibited, and that the use of paper money has been substituted in lieu of it. In short, the very ground why gold and silver are commonly esteemed superior money, namely, that they are supposed to be of great intrinsic value, is one of the reasons which makes them useless for the purposes of circulating money. It is that intrinsic value which spoils their usefulness by inviting theft, counterfeiting, clipping, plugging, gutting, and sweating.

Soon after the first issue, the paper transfers of Venice were made a legal tender, and the effect was to make this paper the most desirable currency without any specie basis.

During a period of six hundred and twenty-six years, from 1171 until the country was conquered by Napoleon in 1797, this paper currency was the best money of the republic. The historian says:

Neither book, nor pamphlet, nor speech have we found in which any merchant or dweller in Venice ever put forth any condemnation of this money. The facility of payment in this money made it the admiration of Europe, honorable at once to the government and merchant of Venice, and a support to the pride and power of its people consisted in substituting as a medium of payment the debt of the republic for current coin.

"It was perfectly understood that no coins passed, neither any right to any, on a transfer in this currency." This money was worth 20 per cent. more than gold coin during a period of over four hundred years, notwithstanding "the Venetian gold ducat was held in high repute, far and wide, for its purity."

The historian says:

To comprehend this extraordinary fact of a credit on the books of a bank, with no money in its vaults, and not bound to make that credit good in later times, even by the payment of interest, or to reduce it in any way, having been for hundreds of years at a high premium over gold and silver, we need only remember that these credits were the funds in which debts were chiefly paid. (See Darus's History de Venice, volume 3, page 72; Caldwell's Credit System, page 288; B. A. Hill's Absolute Money.)

Our credits, $346,681,016, made a full legal tender, are worth more than gold. We have shown this by the testimony of the Secretary. We have shown our constitutional right to use this legal tender. Will the bullionists, specie-basis bankers, their attorneys, and subsidized presses please give some reason why the American people should not be allowed to use more legal-tender currency in the place of national-bank paper and the interest-bearing bonds? Is it repudiation to pay in this credit money, preferred by creditors and worth more than gold? Is not the credit of thirty-eight American States with fifty million of people and $40,000,000,000 of wealth as good as that of the little Venetian Republic?

Specie basis has always been a delusion and an absurdity—that is, the specific redemption in a single commodity. A legal tender for all purposes is a currency redeemable in gold, silver, and all other commodities. No foreign wars can remove its basis, no panics, no revolutions in trade can possibly affect it. Its legal value, established by the sovereign power of a great nation which controls all products and all commodities, will not be questioned by loyal American citizens who have become familiar with the history of their colonial ancestors, whose prosperity was identified with their legal-tender paper money, and who gave us a nation without gold. Remove the legal-tender character of metal money, and it becomes irredeemable. Gold is not redeemable in the greater part of Asia. Silver is not redeemable in Turkey, Brazil, and many other countries. It was demonetized in this country from 1873 until 1878.

The net profits of all the banks in the United States:
In 1836, 15 per cent.
In 1837, 13 per cent.
In 1838, 18 per cent.
Between 1838 and 1852 the net profits only once fell as low as 8 per cent. That was in 1840.
In 1852 the net profits reached 19 per cent.
In 1853 the net profits reached 32 per cent.

Yet these banks during sixty years previous to the late war caused a financial crisis and hard times as often as once in eight or ten years. The people had become accustomed to being robbed and ruined periodically. This grand system of swindling was called specie-basis banking. The people were told by subsidized presses that this was a subject that common people could not understand; that the volume of currency would regulate itself. Webster said:

There never has been devised by man a plan more specious by which labor could be robbed of the fruits of toil than the banking system. The people not only take bank paper as money, paying interest on it at enormous rates, but when the banks suspend the people lose the discount, while the bankers gain it. The people wonder why financial panics occur so frequently. I can tell them why. It is to the interest of the bankers and brokers that they should occur. It is one of the specious methods by which these despotic and utterly useless knaves rob the producing, the manufacturing, and the mercantile classes of their honest earnings. It is one of the chief plans by which this infamous ring is riveting the chains of slavery upon the limbs of labor. It is one of the chief means adopted to build up a money aristocracy that shall live in idle luxury and ape the pretentious airs of European nobility.

The estimated losses to creditors from the failures of national banks during the eighteen years since the passage of the act, is $6,270,000. (Comptroller's report, page 3, 1881.) Making an estimate from the net profits as shown by the above table, if the banks were to issue all the currency, what time would be required to absorb all national wealth? Would there be any loss to creditors, would there be any necessity for paying high salaries to thousands of bank officers and agents, if all money were issued by the Government?

SPECIAL PRIVILEGES GRANTED TO NATIONAL BANKS.

1. The Government holds their bonds in safe-keeping for them without charging them a cent for the favor.

2. It collects the interest on their bonds from the people and pays it over to them free of charge.

3. It furnishes them with $900 of bank notes as a free gift to loan out for every $1,000 of bonds they deposit with the Government.

4. It allows them to draw interest on their bonds (i. e. the people's bonds) and their own bank notes at the same time—a twofold interest.

5. It imposes no tax either on their bonds or on their money, but exacts that much more off the people.

6. It places $800,000,000 of the people's money, called "the deposits," in their possession to speculate on and establish banks on.

7. It allows them to draw interest both on what the Government (the people) owe them and what they owe the people.

8. It authorizes the Treasurer to pay them one year's interest in advance, that they may have it to speculate on.

9. A law enacted for their special benefit on June 20, 1874, authorizes them, after they have flooded the country with their notes, and inflated prices of all property to high figures, to suddenly contract their circulation, and thus contract and prostrate business and ruin the country.

10. The law (January 19, 1875) authorizes them, after they have invested very largely in the property they have thus reduced to half price, to inflate their circulation again and raise prices so that they can make larger fortunes by selling at high prices the property they had bought up for a trifling sum.

Has the Government bond, upon which the national bank is based, any better security than the legal tender?

The people have been educated upon the currency question within the last six years as never before. They demand their own legal-tender money in preference to any other. It has been ascertained by a careful estimate of gold coins in circulation in various countries that the loss by wear is equal to one-fiftieth every year. There is no redemption for this loss. The legal tender when worn is redeemed with a new issue. The constant wear of the circulating coin currency and the immense increase of population and the increasing business of civilization make it impossible for statesmen, with a reasonable allowance of business intelligence and integrity, to advocate any limitation of the business of the world to any metal. It is estimated by some statisticians that every dollar of gold raised in the mines of California has an average cost of $2 to get it.

One very intelligent lawyer, like the distinguished Senator from Delaware, proposes to prohibit marriages and limit the population to the metals. This would be no more absurd or ludicrous than all other arguments of specie-basis men. Rome fell into barbarism because the population outgrew the metals. The pretense of specie basis of any kind is a fraud. The promise to pay in specie is generally a lie. The system teaches people to deceive, to be dishonest. It is a confidence game from first to last. The growth of population, of civilization, and of business by means of labor-saving machinery, of the discovery and utilization of steam, within the last sixty years, has been fifteen hundred to one, while there has been no such corresponding increase of gold and silver. As well attempt to move the freights of the world with ox-carts instead of freight-trains and steamboats as to talk about limiting the commerce of the world in any degree to any metal. It is not only disrespect for government but it is an insult to the intelligence of the American people. Harvey, an English political economist, pages 34 and 39, says:

> The plain fact is that the vast commercial and industrial transactions of this country cannot, by any ingenious contrivance, be carried on securely for any length of time with a circulation based upon or even nominally convertible into gold. There is not gold enough in the world. With a gold standard all the energies of the country are circumscribed and overpowered.
> These public debts, if looked into closely, are only a machinery for mortgaging the labor of generations unborn, adding to the constantly increasing power of the moneyed or creditor interest.

In 1830 the contraction of the currency in France caused hard times and the organization of the communes. In 1847 the contraction of the currency caused a reorganization of the communes and the revolution of 1848. In 1870 the French people had a war with Germany. They were whipped in war, but victorious in peace. They issued $620,000,000 additional paper currency, made a full legal tender, kept at par with gold without specie basis; employed their population in the manifold industries of the country. The immense increase of the products of the country for exportation enabled them by these products to purchase bills of exchange to pay this stipend of $1,000,000,000 to Germany within twenty-seven months from June 1, 1871, completing the payment of their national debt September 5, 1873. The large products of industry, the fruits of a full legal-tender paper currency, continued to bring gold from other nations and gave prosperity to France.

On the other hand, Germany was victorious in war and whipped in peace. She contracted her paper currency and demonetized her silver, paralyzed her industries by such contraction, filled Germany with unemployed and hungry men. Thousands sought employment in prosperous France. Our own history is similar to that of Germany. We were victorious in war, but most unmercifully whipped by the specie-basis conspirators in peace. A large portion of our paper currency was destroyed, our silver demonetized, and an unnecessary interest-bearing debt spread over the American people. This was not the result of accident or of ignorance; it was premeditated legislation in the interest of the few to enslave the many.

Partisan leaders seem to learn nothing from history. The gentleman from New York, [Mr. HEWITT, Democrat,] says, (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, March 30, 1882:)

> The resources of the country had been overstrained and exhausted by the expenditures of the war, and by the "delirium" of an "inconvertible paper currency," which produced an unnatural exhilaration in the industrial system. The reaction was necessarily severe. It did not and could not cease until the currency was placed on the solid basis of convertibility into gold, the universal standard of value in the world of commerce.

> Now, the result of the cessation of the era of depression, stagnation, rest, and recuperation which followed the panic of 1873, and of the revival of business was due to the substitution of good money for bad money.

Will the gentleman please tell us what he means by the substitution "of good money for bad money?" Does he mean the remonetization of silver and the coinage of about $100,000,000 of those silver coins which he called "inferior, cheap, and cheating fiat dollars" in his speech of February 19? Or does he mean the many millions of gold coins which have been deposited in the Treasury in exchange for legal-tender paper money or silver certificates redeemable in those "cheap and cheating" fiat silver dollars? Does he mean that the $346,681,016 legal-tender paper ordered into the circulation as permanent money in 1878 and now worth a premium over gold was the good money which gave us greater prosperity? Was the receiving of legal-tender paper for import duties, which made the paper worth more than gold, what the gentleman means by "substitution of good money for bad money?" Does not the gentleman understand that the $400,000,000 added to the currency since 1878 has given corresponding vitality to every industry? That it was contraction of the currency that caused hard times and inflation that has given us renewed life and energy?

The honorable gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON, Republican,] in his speech of March 28, 1882, said:

> But, say gentlemen, how about the disaster of 1873? I see the question in the smiles on the faces of my friends over the way. The answer to that is very evident, that under the influence of overproduction both at home and abroad extravagant enterprises were inaugurated, in railroads especially, with great inflation of credit. The first great railroad that broke down took others, the whole iron industry, and the whole system of credit down with it. Then commenced the toppling of connected industries and credits, and one after another all went down. The same disaster went over free-trade England and all Europe, for the same overproduction was there. But now mark the sequence of the history of that disaster. Which was the first country to recover? Was it a European free-trade country, like England? On the contrary, we were the first country that began to recover from that disaster of overproduction.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] says:

> We can all recollect such periods in our history, and know what depression, distress, and general disaster such a surplus of products not needed for consumption is sure to entail; our very abundance becomes the source of our misery.

The most skillful Democratic and Republican bank and bullion doctors, after many years of legislative experience and philosophical research, have at last solved the great problem, and philanthropically donate to the world their most profound conclusions.

We give the explanation of the cause of hard times and good times, as taken from the speeches of two distinguished party leaders. From these speeches we learn that the American people suffered during many years because of "the delirium of an inconvertible paper currency," and because of the great "disaster of overproduction." The people are informed that they suffered hunger because they had too much food; that they were ragged and barefooted because they had too many boots and clothes; that all industries were paralyzed and the land filled with tramps because we had a surplus of products and too much "inconvertible paper currency." If the victimized people should happen to discover that they were not made "miserable" by a "surplus of products" and too much "bad money," (that is, money that does not pay toll to money-kings,) but that they were made to suffer hard times because of special laws made in the interest of capitalists, the people might be willing to retire such law-makers, as these statesmen have provided for retiring our Army officers on large salaries after they are sixty-two years of age.

That the people are made "miserable" by "a surplus of products," the "great disaster of overproduction." Hence the legitimate conclusion of both political parties, that the laboring classes and producers of wealth are made happy and prosperous by making laws granting special privileges to large manufacturers for high protective tariffs; to railroad companies unlimited charges; bullionists and bankers high rates of interest, in order to remove the great burden of "bad money" and "surplus products" from the people. That the people may not be made "miserable" with "surplus products" and too much "cheap and cheating money," as the gentleman from New York calls it, $300,000,000 will be kept idle and the people compelled to pay interest upon bonds and to pay high tariffs to keep them from being afflicted by another great "disaster of overproduction." The policy of these political leaders appears to be to permit the capitalists of Wall street to take a large proportion of those "surplus products" (the honest earnings of the laboring classes) and allow a few millionaires only to suffer the "misery" caused by the "great disaster of overproduction."

In regard to "inconvertible paper currency," General Grant says, in his message of December 1, 1873:

> The experience of the present panic has proven that the currency of the country, based as it is upon the credit of the country, is the best that has ever been devised. Usually in times of such trials currency has become worthless, or so much depreciated in value as to inflate the values of all the necessaries of life as compared with the currency. Every one holding it has been anxious to dispose of it on any terms. Now we witness the reverse. Holders of currency hoard it as they did gold in former experiences of a like nature.

The gentleman from New York will please notice this testimony. "Inconvertible" paper money in 1873. No specie basis. Paper money, "based as it is upon the credit of the country, is the best that has ever been devised." This was before the enactment of a law for specie resumption. This is the kind of "bad money" together with "surplus products" that caused hard times, according to the latest teachings of modern Democracy.

We would call the attention of the gentleman from New York to the language of the political economist, Colwell, page 101. He says:

Among savages the precious metals are, no doubt, directly compared with the articles for which they are bartered. With them it is literally so much of one thing for so much of another. It is not so in civilized life, where commodities are very seldom sold with any thought of payment being exacted in gold or silver.

Civilization settles the question that "money is that which the law requires the creditor to receive in payment for debts."

We see that the legal tender, fully sustained by the Supreme Court, has saved the expense of purchasing bullion, $346,681,016, and has saved in simple interest upon the 5 per cent. bonds to purchase bullion, in twenty years, $346,681,016, an aggregate saving to the people of $693,362,032. If we had used bank paper, $350,000,000, based upon bonds at 5 per cent., the cost in interest upon bonds would have been $350,000,000.

If we had used gold the cost of bullion would have been $350,000,000, and the simple interest at 5 per cent. upon the bonds to purchase the bullion during twenty years, $350,000,000 more, making an aggregate cost of $700,000,000.

If we had used standard silver dollars costing eighty-eight cents each for the bullion, saving twelve cents on each dollar by "fiat," the $350,000,000 of money would have cost the people $308,000,000 for the bullion and $308,000,000 more for the interest upon bonds during the twenty years, making an aggregate of $616,000,000 for that amount of currency during twenty years. This would have saved to the people $84,000,000 by the use of fiat silver; $66,000,000 of silver certificates, redeemable only in this "cheap and cheating fiat" silver money are in circulation as money; $38,000,000 of gold coin have been deposited in exchange for such silver certificates, business men preferring the certificates based on this "fiat, cheating" money to gold coins. According to the report of the Director of the Mint, page 36, the people gained by "fiat" profits on standard and silver dollars coined during the year previous to June 30, 1881, the sum of $3,346,949.99, and "fiat" profits on the manufacture of minor coins $274,423.73.

Would not bullion certificates, which are preferred to either coin, and which would save the expense of coinage, and also the loss by wear or abrasion, be better for the people than either gold or silver coins? The people prefer the legal-tender greenback currency which pays no tolls to bullionists or bankers. The idea of any necessity for commodity value in money, belongs to an age of barter, and not to an age of civilization. The people will see what kind of money pays them best, that which gives freedom and prosperity, or that which makes them serfs and slaves to a capitalistic aristocracy.

It is morally criminal to place the producers of wealth at the mercy of capitalists by special legislation, as was done in this country during a period of years from 1865 to 1878, contracting the currency hundreds of millions of dollars under the false pretense of reaching a specie basis. The American people hold those specie-basis legislators responsible for the financial crisis of 1873, for the hard times during ten years previous to 1878. The people hold those men responsible for the sacrificing of the homes of hundreds of thousands of industrious and innocent people and for filling the land with thousands of bankrupts, paupers, and criminals.

The people hold those legislators responsible for the unjust laws which caused 3,000,000 able-bodied men to be thrown out of employment and forced to beg for work and for bread during those long and fearful years of suffering. The silver commission estimated the number of tramps at 3,000,000. If those men could have been employed at $1 each per day, three hundred working days each year, $900,000,000 per year, equal to $7,200,000,000 in eight years, a sum of money would have been realized sufficient to purchase a country 1,000 miles in width and 1,125 miles in length, at $10 per acre.

Those legislators should be held responsible for railroad strikes and destruction of property, for the suffering and starvation of thousands of men, women, and children. Those specie-basis legislators should be held responsible for unjust laws designed to make the rich richer and the poor poorer. They should be held responsible for the thousands of disheartened bankrupts and paupers who fill the graves of suicides. No language can express the just indignation of a long-suffering people, through a period of many years of hard times, caused by a series of special laws designed for special purposes.

Table showing the increase of currency in the United States since 1878.

There was an increase of currency from January 1, 1879, to November 1, 1881, of—

Gold coin	$284,258,845
Silver coin	79,463,562
National-bank paper	36,552,576
Amount of increase within two years and ten months	400,274,983

(Comptroller's report, December 5, 1881.)

	January 1, 1879.	November 1, 1879.	November 1, 1880.	November 1, 1881.
Gold coin	$278,310,126	$355,681,532	$453,882,692	$562,568,971
Silver coin	106,573,803	126,009,537	158,320,911	186,037,365
Legal tender	346,681,016	346,681,016	346,681,016	346,681,016
National bank	323,791,674	337,181,418	343,834,107	360,244,250
Total	1,055,356,619	1,165,553,503	1,302,718,726	1,455,631,602

The large increase of money in the United States since 1878, as shown by the Comptroller's report, has given new vitality to all the industries of the country. As contraction of the volume of money caused hard times, so inflation gives us prosperity. This is the simple repetition of the history of all nations in all ages. Those millions of unemployed and hungry men who were scandalized and imprisoned, and who were put in chain-gangs as tramps, by those who had robbed and starved them through unjust legislation, have been awakened to new life and hope as honest and industrious Americans. During the year 1880 those industrious people built 8,174 miles of new lines of railroad, and in 1881 an additional amount of 8,242 miles of road, and all other enterprises have been developed in proportion. Should not those heartless specie-basis law-makers be held responsible for the contraction of the currency during ten years? With the pages of history open to every American child, shall those men be allowed to plead ignorance in justification of such national wrong?

When we read of the James brothers, of the outlaws of the mountains wrecking occasionally a railroad train, we are struck with horror at such human depravity. But how much more alarming are the consequences when all of our industries are paralyzed, a whole nation prostrated in fearful gloom during a period of years by a series of premeditated unjust laws? Can there be any just retribution for the dwarfed childhood and crushed manhood caused by this specie-basis idolatry?

A few years since chattel slavery was the corner-stone of the American Republic. To doubt the divinity of this institution was a heresy not to be tolerated. To-day the Rothschilds and their agents in Wall street dictate reverence to their gods of gold, the limitation of commerce, and American civilization to their system of paganism, by means of which the nations have been cursed and enslaved. A grand army of 500,000 brave, conscientious, and intelligent voters, with the flags of Jefferson and Franklin, are moving fearlessly and rapidly upon the enemy's works. We say to those specie-basis conspirators, who stopped the growth and progress of the American States during a period of many years, and caused hard times in spite of God's sunshine and rain and bountiful harvests—the past is yours, but the future is ours.

In behalf of the American people, who have confidence in a government by the people and for the people, we demand that the people's currency, unjustly taken from the people and destroyed, or put into an interest-bearing debt, shall be restored to the circulation as currency instead of drawing interest in bonds or stored at great expense for safes and watchmen lying idle in the Treasury, while the people are compelled to pay interest upon hundreds of millions of dollars of unnecessary bonds.

We have shown by the testimany of the Secretary of the Treasury that the creditors prefer the legal-tender paper to gold or silver. Why not let them have it and stop interest? We had an immigration equal to 593,703 people during the year 1880, and 720,045 during the year 1881. We have reason to expect even a larger immigration in future years. We demand an increase of the currency equal to the increase of population and the increasing demands of business.

We question the policy, the wisdom of Government purchasing hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of gold, silver, iron, lead, wheat, cattle, or any other commodity and holding it without use at great expense to strengthen the credit of our Government. The producers of wealth, the tax-payers, intelligent Americans, students of Jefferson and Franklin, want no such unjust legislation in the interest of money speculators, bankers, usurers, Shylocks, and tories.

History proves that gold was never the money of a people struggling for freedom. The gold of King George paid armies to butcher, scalp, murder, and burn, during seven long years. Their bayonets were driven from this land without gold. When a few years since English pirate-ships preyed upon our commerce, they were driven from the seas without gold. During the fearful trials of the late war our soldiers were paid without gold.

This coin-idolatry has cursed this land, as it has cursed all lands, with periodical panics, hard times, and human slavery.

It affords an opportunity, a deceptive pretense, for a few men to control all the wealth and to absorb all the products of industry. Relieve the people of the absurd idea of the necessity of a commodity value in money, of the barter trade of barbarism; teach them that governments have supreme power to establish legal values for all of the exchanges of civilization, and you strike down the chains of slavery and remove the opportunity for the few to rob the many. This would allow the people to use that money which is now idle, to stop interest, to increase the circulation equal to the demands of business, and give employment to labor, develop the resources of the country, give greater encouragement to those who produce all wealth, and elevate our American people to a higher civilization.

Mr. BURROWS, of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, if Congress had one single mind and if its opinions could be uttered through the medium of one tongue, I would like to listen to the answer which this Congress would give to the questions which are suggested by the bill under consideration. This bill (H. R. No. 4167) is the result of a complex process of gestation in the Committee on Banking and Currency, and bears the title of "a bill to enable national banking associations to extend their corporate existence." As such it is a matter of serious import to the people I represent, as well as to the people of the United States at large; and I propose, Mr. Speaker, to discuss briefly, in a somewhat Socratic method, some of the salient features of this bill. The antithesis of the measure before us is the cornerstone of the National party, which I have the honor to represent in part on this floor.

The measure before us is the rock of offense of both the old parties of the country against the welfare and wishes of the people.

Were I to include, as I very properly might, upward of sixty Democrats and nearly a score of Republicans, with the little group of Nationals on this floor who owe their selection as Representatives here to their antagonism to the purposes of this bill, I might claim that no one measure, not even the tariff, had so vital a hold upon public sentiment, had so much to do with the character of this House and has so much to do with the character of the next two Congresses that are to meet here, as the measure which is being driven through this body with unbecoming and inconsiderate haste at the bidding of the favored few, the privileged class, the potent plutocrats, the commercial cliques, and the corporate cabals who demand the passage of this bill in their interests, with as little discussion as possible, and with all the speed that the fear of an awakened and growing public sentiment can urge to the flying feet of the financial pirates who are getting to their castle with the plunder of twenty years upon their backs, and seeking to have Congress bar the door against their pursuers by slipping the bolt of this bill as a law to guard their treasure for twenty years to come.

What, Mr. Speaker, I ask, is the reason for this bill? Speaking for the people generally who do not own banking franchises, and for the people of my own State and district in particular, I ask this Congress, What do you mean to do by passing this bill? Who ask for its passage? What interests are to be conserved? What evils are to be averted? What errors are to be corrected? And what benefits are to result, and to whom are the benefits to accrue from the passage of this bill? The bill proposes to extend the existence of a class of corporations that exist not for the purpose of producing anything, not for agricultural, manufacturing, educational, charitable, or even strictly commercial business purposes.

A class of corporations that add not a dime to the wealth or intelligence of the people; a class of corporations that in the present state of civilization do not contribute to society as much as a traveling circus that amuses the multitude, nor add to the security of our finances half as much as a modern iron safe that scarcely demands even the tithing of a patent royalty for a service that is actually greater than that of the associations known as incorporated banks throughout the whole Union; such a class of corporations are here demanding the sanction of Congress for a further lease of power for twenty years—to do what? Why, they propose to furnish the people with a paper currency that is as much superior to the old State bank currency as that was superior to the cowry of the African coast, says the representative of these banks.

I admit it; but I ask what of it? As the lawyers say, I demur to this statement. I wish to know why these corporations should be chartered to do that for the people which they can do so much better for themselves?

I would like some of the many gentlemen on this floor who are either the officers, directors, or stockholders of some of these national banks, and who will vote on this measure in which they have a direct pecuniary interest, or I would ask even those more judicial members, who favor this bill without a direct pecuniary interest, if they can give me one reason, just one good and valid reason, why they ask for the existence of a chartered monopoly or class to be created or perpetuated between the people and their Government that shall have delegated to it the sovereign power of issuing that which passes current as money in this country when the Government itself issues a paper currency as much superior to the notes or current debts of these national banks as their notes, when indorsed by the Government, are superior to the old State-bank notes?

Nobody wants, nobody argues for, no one dreams of a return to the old system of paper currency that existed prior to the rebellion. There has not been heard in this Congress, nor for years before it, the voice of a solitary member on this floor advocating a return to the old State-bank system of currency; and when I see, as I constantly do, that gentlemen in the advocacy of this bill are constantly throwing up the false cry of "State banks or national banks," and asking us if we who oppose the national banking system would be willing to return to the old State-bank currency, I am compelled to declare that these gentlemen not only misrepresent the national party, but are raising a false issue to divert attention from the real issue now before the people.

The issue is not between the old State banking system and the present national banking law, any more than there is an issue between the old wooden plow of a century ago and the steam gang-plow of steel to-day, or between the dug-out boat of the savage and the steel steamer of our day. Men are not so conservative as to forever cling to that which has been supplanted by a better thing.

We no longer insist on wampum and coon-skin currency, although we know that at a time in our history they were the best and most acceptable in general use. So, too, we have relegated to the lumber-room and museum of the past the old State-bank money of 1860, and we who oppose national-bank currency have no more intention of using it again than the cotton factories or fabric-makers of to-day have of abandoning the inventions of Arkwright and Jacquard for the old spinning-wheels of our grandmothers in the forgotten attics of our older homesteads.

Where, then, Mr. Speaker, is the issue? Clearly not between the best and the worst, but between the better and the best; not between the effete and the useful, but between the useful and the improved or more useful.

Steam no longer competes with horse-power, its supremacy being conceded; but electricity is beginning to dispute many fields with steam.

So, too, the Treasury note is competing with the national-bank note for recognition in law of the supremacy that is already conceded to it by popular estimation.

The issue is between the United States and the favorite class of bankers for whom the Government has been indorsing for twenty years.

The people propose to go into the business for themselves, instead of indorsing for an ungrateful and greedy class, who demand and receive pay from the indorser, upon whose credit they thrive.

The constitutional prohibition against any of the States making anything but gold and silver a legal tender is accepted in good faith by the party most earnestly opposing national-bank currency, and with it we accept in the same spirit the fact that the Constitution has made the General or Federal Government the sole power to issue or coin lawful money of the United States, whether of metal or of paper. The power to coin or make money having been delegated by the States to the Federal Government is exclusively vested in the General Government; and as if to emphasize the perpetual or irrevocable nature of this grant of supreme power by which the States, for the common welfare and convenience of all, divested themselves of those parts of their sovereignty which they conferred upon the Federal authority to create the nation, the tenth amendment to the original Constitution declares that "all powers not herein granted are reserved to the States or to the people thereof."

Like the powers to levy taxes, duties, and imposts, the powers to declare war, to make treaties, to maintain an army and navy, to establish post-offices and post-roads, the power of making, coining, or issuing the money of a nation is one of its most important sovereign attributes. These are powers that every nation guards with zeal, and which none allow to be infringed upon with impunity. Why, therefore, should we create, countenance, or continue a favored class of citizens, or of artificial persons known as corporations, to whom we unlawfully and unconstitutionally delegate one of the sovereign attributes and functions of the Government?

What excuse have we for giving to corporations the power to issue money or currency any more than to create another class of corporations, like the great manufacturing companies, to levy the tariff, or a part of it; or to still other corporations, like the railway and express companies, to establish post-offices and post-roads; or to give to combinations of merchants duly incorporated the power to make treaties; or to lawyers the power to declare war, or confer upon the Grange organizations the function of regulating taxation or the issue of patents?

There is not a whit more reason or excuse for the one than for the other of these methods; and since the preposterous character of an entire government by corporation, worse than the old guilds of London, is apparent to every one, and since we have by indirection and maneuver already far too much of government by corporations, it becomes every man in this House and in this land to see to it that he take his stand on the solid ground of popular rights and of constitutional government in this issue as against class privileges and the incongruous government by corporations that the present anomalous financial laws of this country now exhibit.

That portion of our currency that consists of coin, even to the paltry copper and the almost intrinsically worthless three-cent nickel coin, is so jealously regarded as the sole issue of the rightful authority of the General Government that the severest penalties are visited upon all persons or corporations who issue tokens, coins, or currency in imitation of these issues. Why should not the Government guard with still greater jealousy its exclusive right to issue the paper money of the land? Why not treat as counterfeiters all banks of issue that purport to issue any money other than "lawful money of the United States," or the standard coins of its mints? Surely the plea of convenience cannot be raised, for the Government prints and furnishes all the national-bank notes as well as the Treasury notes, and can therefore furnish enough. Besides, the plea of convenience would not avail the counterfeiter, or even the miner or assayer of bullion, were they to issue coin of equal or greater fineness and value than that of the authorized mints of the Government; and the penalty of a violated law would be inflicted on those who had usurped this attribute and function of Federal sovereignty, even though no injury had actually resulted.

But the gentlemen who urge the passage of this bill tell us that banks are a necessity of our civilization and of our commerce.

I admit it, but I most emphatically deny that it is a necessity of commerce or of civilization that the debts or notes of these banks should be authorized to circulate as currency, and to take the place of real money of the Government, especially under the conditions that now exist to favor these institutions.

Banks of exchange, discount, and deposit we must have at present, but banks of issue should be suppressed as counterfeiters in the interest of commerce, justice, and labor's rights to uniform standards which shall not be made to fluctuate according to the caprice or greed of the capitalist classes who control banking corporations.

But, again say these gentlemen, if you admit the convenience and usefulness of banks of discount, exchange, and deposit, you must know that without the power to issue money or emit bills of credit or circulate their notes as current funds these banks could not or would not exist.

This proposition I utterly deny, and it is so far from true that I have only to cite the fact that in the State of New York alone there is an increasing number of State banks that now reaches nearly one hundred and fifty that do a profitable banking business without issuing a dollar of currency or notes of their own to pass for money. In fact not one-third of the banks and banking institutions of this country are banks of issue. Comptroller Knox, the special advocate of these national banks, shows, on page 25 of his report for December, 1880, that there were then 6,532 banks and banking houses and institutions in the United States, of which but 2,076, or not one-third, were national banks; that while the banks that do a legitimate business and issue no currency had deposits to the extent of $1,319,009,000, the national banks held, through the partiality of Government deposits, &c., only about $420,000,000 less than the other banks.

These figures at least offered us ample ground for denying the claim of the national-bank advocates on this floor and elsewhere, that the unconstitutional and dangerous function of issuing as currency the notes of these banks is essential to existence or prosperity of legitimate banking in this country, and for declaring that it is a claim that is as devoid of merit as it is false in fact and vicious in policy. Besides this, let me cite a few figures to show that our banking system does not need the royalty and profitable business of issuing money to sustain it in affluence and security such as the most conservative man, if a patriot, would take no alarm at. The annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the state of the finances for 1881, over the signature of Secretary Folger, shows that upon a capital of $463,821,985, and with an aggregate circulation of $360,344,250, the national banks then in existence, numbering 2,132, managed to have outstanding loans amounting to $1,169,022,303. That is to say, they managed to get more than $3 due to them for every dollar of circulation they had by loaning the currency over and over again, and thus making $1 do the work that $3.50 should have done in the commercial and business transactions of the country. This they did by "loans and discounts," the profits of which depend largely and mainly upon the scarcity of current funds. The scarcity of current funds, under existing law, depends or is made to depend so largely upon the caprice of the banker that the power to retire or to inflate the volume of currency, which is at all times in the hands of the non-producing class, represented by the Bankers' Association, that is forever seeking to get out of the producers the largest possible share of the fruits of labor, has become a daily danger to all classes of producers.

The present bill does not propose to remedy this evil in any manner or to any extent, and the people are to be left to the tender mercies of the cunning old spiders who spin the nets to entangle the honey-laden bees of labor through the devices of bank currency, bank discounts, and bank "shaves."

It is true that some of the gentlemen on this floor, having rather more of both intelligence and of conscience in this regard than their more thoughtless and more avaricious fellows, have been put to the blush of shame so often by having this power of shortening or lengthening the currency possessed by the banks constantly complained of, that they have been known to favor and to advocate some limitation or restriction upon the banks in this regard; but I warn gentlemen who may be appealed to for votes to pass this bill upon the ground that any such modification may be ingrafted upon it as an amendment, or that any such provision would accomplish one iota of gain for the people, that just so long as the banks have the power of issuing currency the danger inheres in them, notwithstanding you forbid them to increase or diminish their currency save upon a notice of three, six, or twelve months.

Should Congress seek to insist on this restriction and still give the banks the power to issue money there would arise a new system of subsidiary and ephemeral banks, constantly organizing and going out of existence, merely to avoid the hampering of this proposed restriction and to play into the hands of the great banks the game of circumventing the popular will.

Nor will it do for us to sugar-coat this dose of poison by any other amendments that do not cut off the head of the organized swindle of the whole national banking system by striking out the enacting clause of the bill before us.

The distinguished gentleman from New York, [Mr. FLOWER,] who seeks to throw a tub to the whale of popular indignation over the threatened passage of this bill by allowing the banks to be sued in the State courts and by compelling them to give three months' notice in retiring currency, must be fully aware of the worthlessness of rude palliatives in curing the evils of the national banking system. How, for instance, could he explain to the people of the Empire State in his projected gubernatorial campaign that the three months' notice amendment was of any real value, when the intelligent people of that State, as of the whole Union, are fully aware that the Bankers' Association, which meets at Saratoga every year, acts as one man, and can agree to give the required notice just in time to shorten up ready funds when the autumn crops need gathering or moving, or just in time to catch the spring opening of business and exact the big shaves on currency that are regulated by the morality and avarice of the bankers and all other monopolists, whose limit of extortion is avowed by them to be "all that the traffic will bear?"

Certainly the gentleman from New York does not believe that the people, who generally have no money to waste in lawsuits against rich and unscrupulous corporations, would be pacified in their indignation against a perpetuity of the national-bank swindle by the convenience of the boon he would accord them of prosecuting in the State courts their cases against these banks. Nor will the proposition of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. SCALES,] which would vouchsafe to the dear people the privilege (?) of pledging their lands to the national banks, so far neutralize the poison that lurks in this cup now held to the lips of Congress by the Bankers' Association, who demand that we swallow this bill, as to make it either a pleasing or a safe dose. Neither do I see safety or reason in the proposed amendment of my colleague, [Mr. BUCKNER,] which would require the national banks to keep their reserves in gold and silver. This proposition, coming from a distinguished Democrat, proves how heartily united the two old parties are in the interest of hard money, tightly locked up from circulation, and hard times tightly bound to the chariot-wheels of the capitalist class by the bond of oppressive class legislation.

The very thing for which many of our Democratic brethren, in common with the Nationals, denounced Senator Sherman when Secretary of the Treasury, the lock-up plan, which asked Congress to appropriate $100,000 to build a new vault to hold the overflow of coin from the glutted Treasury of a nation that owned over a thousand millions of dollars, is now proposed as a Democratic panacea for the rechartered banks. Verily, when this Shermanizing policy is added to the national-bank system, I hardly think the offensive carcass of this public cancer will smell one whit sweeter to the offended public nostrils. But the proposition of the gentleman that these banks shall issue no currency of a less denomination than $10 is merely good in so far as it cuts off the power to issue other smaller notes, but it is bad inasmuch as it does not altogether cut off the power of these banks from issuing currency.

My other colleague and fellow National [Mr. HASELTINE] has offered an amendment, which, like that of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BRUMM,] strikes at the root of the evil, and takes away at once the foundation and the necessity for these national banks.

The appropriation of the hundred or two hundred millions of dollars that lie in worse than idleness in the national Treasury from year to year toward the payment of the national debt is both in accord with honesty and a wise public policy; and the proposition of my distinguished colleague to issue non-interest-bearing Treasury notes to pay off the remainder of the bonded debt that may be due or optional is both just and statesmanlike, and would prove a greater blessing to our land than all the legislation of this Congress or the labors of those of the past twenty years have been able to achieve. No rational argument can be made against its lawful or its equitable character. If the credit of the nation be good in the bond it issues, surely it is better in the currency it would substitute for those bonds, as the substitute would be free from the burden of interest, and might be made taxable.

If the credit of the nation be good only because its Treasury holds coin, then the power of the Government over taxation, titles, property, life, and liberty, are but metaphysical myths to the minds of those who worship only at the glittering altars of mammon; and the government that pays out coin is committing financial suicide. Away with such rubbish! Prate of wisdom to the brutes if the end of government be held to be the hoarding up of treasure! While no man of you who favor this absurdity of a few grains of gold being the only standard of labor's reward, and of hoarded stores of gold in the national Treasury being necessary for any purpose beyond current expenses, dare carry out your financial logic to the absurd end to which it clearly leads, not one of you can successfully deny that the result of your policy is precisely that which I have indicated.

No, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of this Congress, it will not do to attempt to gild this legal crime by trifling amendments. It will not turn away the growing wrath of the injured public for you to curb this financial monster by gentle stays or small fences in its onward path toward unbridled supremacy in national politics and legislation. You must kill it or it will kill you! You must put the untaxed, privileged class of bondholders, who are already insisting that we are paying off the debt too fast and taking away their bonds and privileges, upon the level with other citizens. Already the banks are talking of their "vested rights," and as the gentleman from New York [Mr. FLOWER] assures us in his remarks, they do not need this bill to enable them to continue their existence, but merely to facilitate the continuation of their existence.

If they possess the power to recharter themselves, or if they have a quiet understanding with the Comptroller of the Currency that they can be renewed or rechartered by going out of business and commencing again for twenty years just before their charters expire, then why do these corporations deign to ask any action on the part of Congress at all? Such is their position, in fact, and they gloss over their impudence by formally procuring the sanction of Congress to this bill—just to cover contingencies—in order to avert an outburst of public wrath. I implore Congress and the people to wake up and throttle this monopoly, or the Government of the people will become the slave of the money-power.

The only safety is to cut off wholly the power to issue money which these banks possess; and upon that I stand, whether the present iniquitous special privileges of the national banks be retained or cut off. But, say these gentlemen, the banks need the currency privilege to sustain themselves. In denying it I have shown that they reap profits from each dollar equal to the ordinary profits by loans and discounts on $3.50; but this by no means exhibits the full amount of the profits of these banks.

Out of 2,298 banks existing September 1, 1880, the profits of 2,072 of them above all losses for the six months previous to that date is shown, on page 48 of the annual report of the Comptroller of the Currency, dated December 8, 1880, to be $24,033,250, and for the year prior to that date, $45,186,034. On page 45 of the same report the losses of 1,360 of these banks is shown for the same periods as respectively $7,142,519.96, and $14,706,406, which very largely increases the percentage of profits on their business in order to leave as net gains over $45,000,000 as the result of a year's work.

The Comptroller of the Currency tells us that the national banks have lost in five years, from 1876 to 1880, inclusive, the sum of $100,551,475.45 in their business transactions, and yet he shows that in the same period they have declared dividends to the tune of $199,592,902, and in addition thereto have accumulated a surplus reserve fund of upward of $130,000,000, which they now hold as the "balance of power" in this gigantic struggle between these corporations and the people.

Now, in speaking of this surplus fund we touch the most sensitive part of this vast cancer on the body-politic, and find the nucleus of the organized power of these favored classes by which they are here as a unit clamoring for the practically indefinite extension of their lucrative privileges, which this bill secures if passed.

Comptroller Knox, in his special plea for these banks, called his annual report, dated December 6, 1880, page 47, says that—

> The law provides that a surplus fund shall be accumulated by setting aside before the usual semi-annual dividend is declared one tenth part of the semi-annual net profits of the bank.

And he adds:

> In some cases this legal surplus now exceeds the capital of the bank.

To remember that this vast accumulated surplus of over $130,000,000 is but one-tenth of the net profits of the banks above the regular large semi-annual dividends, and that the banks held at the date of the Comptroller's report the additional item of $46,139,690 of "other undivided profits" and $3,452,504 of "unpaid dividends," we are confronted in the midst of this legislation by the visible power of an accumulation of $180,000,000 held by less than 2,200 corporations as a club over the heads of the people and Congress to beat down opposition to the scheme they have concocted for securing to themselves indefinitely the perpetuity of their still more valuable charters and privileges.

I do not speak carelessly when I say that this vast accumulation in a few hands is held as a club to drive or coax legislation, nor do I mean to be understood that such vast sums are used or are intended to be used to bribe or corrupt legislators; but I do mean that we have heard it distinctly stated by members of this House, by bankers, and by the subservient and subsidized press of the great cities that a failure to recharter these banks would precipitate a financial revolution through the compulsory distribution to the stockholders in these banks of the vast sums thus kept out of use in ordinary business, and that such a jolt or shock to the statu quo of financial circles would demoralize capital, unsettle business, and divest the favored few of much of the mighty power they now possess over the many.

Fools and sciolists, timid speculators, and conservatives destitute of foresight may, with the rich oppressors of labor and parasites of production, whose swollen coffers would, if justice were done, render up to the rightful owners this fund, be frightened at such an act of justice; but the unlocking of these vast sums would place in more numerous hands the funds to promote general business in other channels than the shaving of paper, the loaning of bank credits, and the "bearing" of the money market by vast lock-ups of the currency of the country.

In the interests of business, and in the desire to protect popular rights, agricultural labor, and mechanical industries from the dangerous power of this gigantic banking octopus that holds, in addition to its vast and valuable chartered powers, Government favors, and associated advantages, this vast sum of nearly $200,000,000 of extra, reserve, unexpended, or undivided profits as the result of a few years of money monopoly, (during which they have paid right royal dividends besides,) I demand that the power of this unproductive system be trampled out of existence by the will of every patriot who hopes to leave to his children at least a chance to prosper in the race of life without becoming forever a slave in the treadmill of bank-credit and bank-currency combinations against labor and productive enterprise.

If gentlemen in this House are to-day afraid of the consequences of distributing to its individual owners the present surplus held by these national banks, with what abject slavish submission would they not contemplate the increasing accumulation of this fund through the years and decades that are to follow an extension of their bank charters? If the vaunted statesmen and pseudo-statesmen of to-day stand aghast or tremble in awe before the threatened jolt or jar or disturbance in business which these banks threaten if their demands are not met by this Congress, how clearly must it appear to the man who sees the future or who comprehends the present that we are already bound in the chains of a banking obligarchy and moneyed aristocracy that simply regard the people, the toiling, producing masses, as their legalized prey, and who resent all efforts of a few brave men in Congress to rescue this fair land from the harpies who, under the guise of most benevolent bankers and capitalists, are enabled through the iniquitous laws which this bill would perpetuate to reap all the richest results of the labors of every class of citizens without even claiming to render an equivalent to society for these advantages.

It has not been my purpose, Mr. Speaker, in these remarks to reiterate the familiar evils and oft-cited absurdities of our present banking law, which allows these banks to issue as currency that which is not in law or in fact lawful money, which compels the Government of the United States to pay a few rich men, as soon as they apply for and receive a bank charter, interest on bonds that have been practically redeemed, and royalties to corporations whose notes they indorse, which enables the associated money-kings of the country to form a plutocracy that defies the popular desire to restore to the Government the power of controlling the volume and character of the currency.

I have not attempted to amuse, nor to recite bombastic platitudes to array rich against poor, or labor against its creature and natural servant, capital; but in entering my solemn protest against the continuance of this wicked financial system of our present national banks, that has grown so fat, impudent, and domineering as to threaten the people who would curb its power after the first twenty years of its existence, I have sought to show to the country and to the legal minds of this House that the present system should not be extended or perpetuated, because—

1. It is unconstitutional.
2. It is unnecessary.
3. It is too costly.
4. It is too powerful to be given a further lease of power.
5. It is of neither use nor benefit to any one except the small and favored class who are the recipients of its extravagant favors.
6. It is a vast political machine whose influence is so great on this floor in 1882 that a continuation of its power may be well regarded with apprehension by the people in all parts of the country.

Every man, Mr. Speaker, who sees, as all may see who will look, that with our ever-increasing aggregation of great wealth in our great cities there is an ever-increasing amount of want and crime, of scarcity and hardship among the workers, an increase of underpaid and discouraged farmers and a vast increase in the tendency of our young men to shirk work for the fields of the gamblers, moneychangers, and other parasitic classes that are so influential in this country at present; all, I say, who see these things must feel that unless we do something to prevent this centripetal aggregation of wealth; something to restrain the present tendency to disinherit the many and to give all to the few; something to soften or mitigate the sharpness of the contrast that is forever rising higher and higher between the two chief products of the Democratic-Republican financial policy of to-day, namely, millionaires and paupers; unless we do some of these things there is and will be dangers to our institutions, to our families, and to our very lives, which will surely come in the same or worse forms, as it will come from the same causes in more modern form, as the terror of the French Revolution of 1789.

Industry will not be forever wronged, robbed, injured merely to gratify the greed of the moneyed class. Agriculture will not be forever the bond-maid of banking and railway rings. Manufacture and invention will not remain indefinitely and unquestioningly the serfs and beggars of the money lenders, who hold them under this financial system at the mercy of the ignorance, cupidity, or timidity of those who control capital.

Mr. Speaker, you know these things are true. The very gentlemen who ask us to pass this bill know these things are true.

Gentlemen who profess to be anti-monopolists, who can see the evils of railway monopoly, of gas monopoly, of water monopoly, of shipping or manufacturing monopolies, shut their eyes at the command of the banker who exacts tribute from them under guise of doing them the favor to shave their notes or discount their paper credit, and obediently refuse to see the size or iniquitous character of the master monopoly of them all, the parent monopoly of all the rest, that of the money or currency monopoly of these national banks.

It is against this monster monopoly that the people are fighting. It is to resist its further encroachments that they have organized, stood by, and are extending the power of the National party which I have the honor in part to represent here. Knowing these things as you do, knowing that the substitution of Treasury notes for the present volume of national-bank notes would be hailed as a boon by all the farmers, workers, and producing classes of this land, both because it would give us a better currency of real money and because it would be a saving of many millions of dollars annually to the whole people; knowing that the votes you give here on this measure, the record you will make on this bill, cannot be obliterated by excuses to your outraged, awakened, and indignant constituents when they shall find themselves bound, gagged, and sold to the money-changers by your act in the passage of this bill—I ask you, in the name of justice, in the name of the American people, and of our country's best interests—

How dare you pass this bill? When its indefensible provisions, its ridiculous subserviency to the power of the "reserve fund" and the "other undivided profits" are exposed before your constituents, as they surely will be; when the appeal is taken from your action here to the people whom you by this bill propose to keep enslaved to the money-kings; when the faithful Greenbackers go to the hustings to expose to the people the full extent of this crime against their rights and best interests, as we surely will do; when, finally, want, oppression, monopoly, and enlightened public opinion combine to bring to justice or to scourge with stripes the men who chose to obey the money-kings rather than the people, you who vote for this bill will be praying for the mountains to fall on you and the waves of a political oblivion to hide you forever.

Upon no ground can the passage of this bill be defended with success. For no valid reason can a vote be asked for it.

It is one of the most wicked, defenseless, inexcusable, flagrant cases of a popular swindle that ever came before Congress, not excepting the land-grant, Credit Mobilier, granite contract, river and harbor, whisky bill, or other swindles that have disgraced the Congressional legislation of the past or threaten it at the present moment. Here and now gentlemen must make their record and choose their fate. They know whether they will serve the people who are opposed to this bill and to the national banking system, or whether they will obey the commands of the Shylock Radicals and Bourbon Democrats who conspire to pass this measure. The crisis has come, and the old dodge of Bourbons and Radicals talking against the national-bank swindle in their districts to get votes and voting with the political harlots who think they conceal their acts from their distant constituents can be played no longer with any hope of success.

In conclusion, I ask, in all candor and seriousness, why should we, how can we, and how dare we pass such a bill as this? Let the bank charters expire. Banking will not cease. Over two-thirds of the banks and banking of the country is already done without these bank charters. Let the charters expire, and put all the banks on a level. Let the charters expire, and put the Government again in sole and exclusive possession of its rights. Let the charters expire, and put the vast revenue accumulations in the bank-vaults into trade, commerce, business, and productive enterprises. Let the charters expire, and behold "the best banking system the world ever saw" thereby superseded by the best currency and most equitable financial system that man has ever devised. Let the charters expire, and forbid with the spirit of Andrew Jackson the rechartering of banks by the Government or by any authority which shall claim the right to empower them to issue currency! Let the charters expire, and the end of monopoly will be in full view! Let the charters expire, and let the people live freed from the national-bank incubus that now assumes to be their master.

Could we have a financial Peter the Hermit to thunder over the land his anathemas, and to preach a new crusade against these banks, his cry at this moment would be: The national banks must go! Let the charters expire!

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I am surprised that when such an attack on the national banking system as is proposed by this bill is made on this floor no voice has been raised from the Republican side of the House in defense of that system, one which was distinctively a Republican measure and one which owes its great success to the wise legislation of that party. This is a bill to enable the national banking associations to extend their corporate existence. The present law upon that subject was passed in 1863 and was amended in 1864. Under that law, as bearing upon this present question, two important provisions were made. The first was that the charters of the associations should endure for a period of twenty years from the date of issue, and the second that an association might be formed at any time. Hence all of the 393 banks whose charters expire before the 25th day of February, 1883, can, under the terms of the present law, reorganize and continue their business. The result is that the object proposed to be accomplished by this bill is in no possible way material to the present national banking system. Whether the bill passes or whether it does not pass, the present system continues, and the banks may organize or reorganize hereafter as they have done heretofore under the existing law. And the pretense that this measure is inherently a part of the national banking system, or something that beneficially affects that system, is in my opinion a false pretense. It has no foundation in fact.

On the other hand, this bill proposes that you shall change our national banking system by amending the acts of 1863 and 1864 so that the corporate existence of any national bank may last forever! That is the whole of it, when you boil it down. In other words, that we shall depart from the historic policy of the grandest party that has ever won a place in the annals of the nation, the Republican party, and retrace the steps which have been productive of the greatest benefit to all classes of our people in connection with the wisest system of banking that the world has ever seen.

Looking, Mr. Speaker, to the beneficent results which have been produced by this system, the Republican party certainly has a right not only to self-congratulation but a right to demand the highest praise for establishing a system, the perfection of which has not been questioned, and for the maintenance of which it has fought foes on every hand.

During the war the national banking act had two effects: the first was to preserve the national credit, because, if I remember correctly, greenbacks were then at a discount of 60 per cent. We had neither gold nor silver coin in circulation and the national-bank notes in giving to the country a currency prevented the further depreciation of the greenback. Another effect was that it enabled the nation to place upon the market a large amount of its bonds. The Government, being without credit or money, was by this system alone enabled to borrow money which otherwise men would have refused to loan. Any one looking at the results of the system in those days must concede that it was both wise and beneficent.

Since the war it has given to this country a uniform currency that is good in every State, in every county, and in every Territory; a currency that has the same value in the East that it has in the West and from the extreme North to the South. It has furnished a currency which, as compared with the old wild-cat and rag-tag-and-bobtail State-bank money will be forever lustrous.

Another thing which it gives to the holder of a national-bank note is absolute security. Gentlemen come here and claim that the banks themselves afford this security. They do not. As a rule the real confidence which men have in these notes is inspired by the fact that a great nation stands behind them. While the banks attribute to themselves a great deal of credit in this respect, the true credit belongs to the system itself, and not to the banks. And the credit of originating the system belongs to the Republican party. And another thing is the security that the system gives to deposits and depositors, of which I need not speak.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there was a very wise foresight in the provision inserted in the organic act that the charters of these banks should expire at the end of twenty years from the date of issue; because that provision was designed to be a defense against the tendency of all moneyed institutions to perpetuate their existence and enhance and aggrandize their power. And, mark you, that provision was inserted by the Republican party in 1863. That was enacted in the days that tried men's souls, and then it was that the party won its greatest renown. Those were days when we had such men as Lincoln and Seward and Chase, when men's souls were purified by patriotism and fired with such love for the nation that they looked far into the future, and, so looking, declared that in twenty years the charters of these national banks should cease. That declaration was the edict of the Republican party in 1863. It has been the principle of our party ever since. It is true Republicanism now, and by it I for one shall stand to-day.

The twentieth year has come; 1863 has passed into 1883; and now—what? The Republican party, in time of profound peace and unexampled prosperity, is asked to change its historic policy and its sagacious forethought by continuing the life of a banking association indefinitely, perpetually, and in contravention of the provisions inserted by the wisdom of the fathers. That is what you are asked to do. That is precisely what this bill means.

I am surprised at the glamour which has somehow been gotten over the eyes of gentlemen, especially on this side of the House. The adroit advocates of this bill have not only sought to make an impression but have succeeded in creating the general impression that because the Republican party, from the very nature of its principles and the very nature and breadth of its sagacity and patriotism, is in favor of the national banking system, therefore it must be in favor of permitting national bankers to change that system. Such a proposition is absurd upon its face. But yet that is the impression which certainly has been made upon this side of the House.

I have tried to show that our national banking system is a Republican measure, and that the Republican party is not only proud of it but has a right to be proud of it. There is no other measure, among the many that will stand bright for all time to come upon the page of our history, which will be more glorious and which will always grow brighter than exactly the financial policy which established this national banking system. But, Mr. Speaker, bankers are not the system. That is the point I want to make. And the Republican party, while in favor of the system, is not necessarily to be in favor of the bankers who derive the benefits from the system. And I for one, as a Republican, do not propose either to desert the traditional policy of the party on the one hand or, on the other, to be made a cat's-paw of by any set of men anywhere upon this or any other question.

I think it is not necessary to show further that this bill is no part of the national banking system. If it means anything in the world, it is seeking to change the system. In other words, it is an attack on the system. It would not be here unless its advocates desired in some way to modify the system. And when you come to look at it you find that it is for the benefit—of whom? Of the note-holders? Of the depositors in the banks? Not at all. Of the credit of the Government? Not at all. It is for the direct benefit of the owners and officers of your national banks, and for the benefit of no other parties that I can see.

The reasons which are urged for the adoption of this measure are—and if I do not state them fairly I ask to be corrected—first, to give the banks the advantage of their present organization. That is well enough if it does not cost too much. When an association has for twenty years so conducted its affairs that it not only has won, but deserved to have won, the confidence of the people among whom it exists, and whose deposits it holds, then certainly upon the ordinary principles of equity such a bank has a right to the credit it derives therefrom. And, as I stated before, unless it costs others too much every fair-minded man is willing that the association should continue to enjoy its established name and reputation.

The second reason is to spare the stockholders the expense and trouble of making new investments. And that, too, is well enough if it does not cost too much. No one maliciously desires to put them to any additional trouble or to any unnecessary expense.

A third reason is to prevent what is alleged as a contraction of the currency, and which I deny as being at all probable. If a contraction in any sense, certainly it will be but a temporary contraction, and yet this is the main point that is urged in support of the bill. These are the three reasons, so far as I have been able to pick them up, why gentlemen advocate the passage of this bill?

Now, I wish to state another reason which I have not heard suggested, though it may have been, and which to my mind is the real reason; it is the milk in the cocoanut; namely, the desire to save the banks the expense of reorganization, and possibly in some cases to save them the exposure of insolvency. What would probably be the expense of reorganization? Take a bank of $100,000 capital. We will say that the premium on its bonds would be $2,500; that the new plates for printing its notes would cost $1,000; that books and sundry expenses of reorganization would cost $500. There you would have a total of $4,000. About 65 per cent. of the banks have a capital of over $100,000; so that this estimate for premium on bonds would be too small, and you can safely put the average expense of reorganization at $5,000 per bank; and I fancy that would be low.

There are somewhere in the neighborhood of 2,200 national banks, so that the total expense of reorganization to them would be about $11,000,000, and I fancy that these $11,000,000 constitute the cat in the meal-bag. There is the gain which I see to the stockholders, and there may be a still greater gain to them in the saving of premium on bonds, because all of these banks will not liquidate this year, and the longer your bonds run the higher they get. And I say nothing of the profit to them of retaining their existing reserved funds.

On the other hand, it is alleged by these gentlemen that there is a gain for the country, and I wish fairly to state it.

The report of the Comptroller of the Currency shows that between April 11, 1882, and February 25, 1883, the charters of three hundred and ninety-three banks will expire; that these banks own bonds, now on deposit in the United States Treasury, amounting to $75,768,700, and that their notes in circulation aggregate $68,070,980. Now, the allegation is that the withdrawal of these $68,000,000 of notes from the circulation will produce such a contraction of the currency as to cause a panic.

I wish fairly to meet that proposition. I deny it, and for two reasons. The first is that less than 6 per cent. of the entire business of the country is transacted by the use of money in any form. Out of every $100 of business exchanges $94 are transacted without the use of "money." I take from the very able speech of my very pleasant friend from Massachusetts [Mr. CRAPO] this statement: that the amount of silver coin in use consists of .17 of 1 per cent., and the amount of gold coin in use consists of 1.38 per cent.——

Mr. CRAPO. Not in use. What I meant by that table was that in the monetary exchanges of all the banks, both those in New York City and those throughout the country, during a given period of time, .17 of 1 per cent. was transacted in silver, 1.38 per cent. was transacted in gold, 4.36 per cent. was transacted in bills, greenbacks, and bank-notes, and the balance was transacted by checks.

Mr. ANDERSON. I am much obliged to my friend; I understood it in that way. Of course I take the experience of banks in this matter of effecting exchanges as a fair standard of what is probably the experience of the whole country.

Mr. CRAPO. I think that is fair.

Mr. ANDERSON. The legal tenders used in these transactions amount to 2.16 per cent. My friend from Massachusetts [Mr. CRAPO] gives the aggregate of the legal-tender notes and of the bank-notes. I have separated them upon the basis of the amount of the two kinds of notes in circulation. I may be wrong in that, but the aggregate is right.

I suppose that the percentage of business transacted by legal-tender notes is 2.16, and the percentage transacted by bank-notes is 2.20. In other words, where any exchange is made, taking the entire business of the country into account, of every $100 of exchanges made only $5.91 of that entire amount of business is settled by the use of silver coin, gold coin, legal-tender notes, and bank-notes combined.

My recollection is that in the transactions of the New York clearing-house about 5 per cent., and in some years only 3 per cent., of the entire business of that institution is performed by money in any shape. Now if that be true, and it undoubtedly is true——

Mr. BRUMM. Will the gentleman allow me ask him a question at this point?

Mr. ANDERSON. With pleasure.

Mr. BRUMM. The gentleman says that about 6 per cent. of all the business of the country is transacted by means of money.

Mr. ANDERSON. Less than 6 per cent.

Mr. BRUMM. Well, we will put it at 6 per cent. Then 94 per cent. is transacted by means of private bills of exchange of different kinds, drafts, promissory notes, &c.?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRUMM. The question I want to ask the gentleman is this: If there was a sufficient amount of the national medium of exchange in the country to do business with, would not these private bills of exchange, promissory notes, &c., be relatively less than they are now?

Mr. ANDERSON. I think not, and for this reason——

Mr. BRUMM. One moment; you can give the reason afterward. Then how can you account for the fact that in France, where the volume of currency, relative to the population, the purchasing power of the dollar, and the square miles of territory has been variously calculated as high as 50 per cent. greater per capita than it is here—of course it is not that if you take the population alone, but I am taking all the elements—the volume of currency there is much greater than here; yet there they hardly know anything about a check, bill of exchange, or promissory note, except in large transactions between large cities and with foreign nations? Now, how does the gentleman account for that?

Mr. ANDERSON. I account for it on the same principle that they yet wear wooden shoes. In other words, they are behind the times by two centuries.

Mr. BRUMM. But they are a very successful people.

Mr. ANDERSON. They are behind the times for all that.

Mr. BRUMM. But they could pay the German war debt in a remarkably short time.

Mr. PRESCOTT. They never paid it.

Mr. ANDERSON. My friend from New York [Mr. PRESCOTT] says they never paid it; I do not know how that is. But my answer to the gentleman is that the American nation in inventions, facilities of business and transmission of intelligence, in finance, and in commerce is to-day head and shoulders above France. And the experience of France on that point would have no weight with me, although undoubtedly it would have weight with my friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BRUMM.] It is the difference of opinion between us.

In other words, I do not believe that the fact that 6 per cent. say, of our commercial exchanges are settled with money, at all alters the fact that men will prefer their own credits or the drafts of institutions which they know to be sound in preference to gold coin, silver coin, silver certificates, legal-tender notes, national-bank notes, or any other form of money. A check or draft is a more convenient instrument of exchange than the bank-note and can be better identified. It is less liable to loss. For this reason I imagine that the true elasticity of our exchanging medium arises not from the national-bank note, not from the legal-tender, not from coin, but from the confidence which American merchants and traders have in American institutions. In other words, your whole system of exchange is based simply upon credit; and when that credit is good men care nothing whatever about your money. From my State we will not send you gold or silver or bank-notes or greenbacks; we will send you a bank-draft.

Mr. CRAPO. How does the gentleman explain the great apprehension of financial trouble that existed in the country a year ago by reason of the withdrawal of $18,000,000 of currency?

Mr. ANDERSON. I am glad my friend has mentioned that matter. I explain it simply in this way: the moment you shake credit you shake as a matter of course the whole commercial means of exchange, including the draft of every bank. The contraction of currency of which the gentleman speaks was, if I recollect aright, brought about as a threat of these identical national banks, which affected the confidence of men in each other all over the nation. It is precisely for this reason that I for one wish to see the power to make such threats taken out of the hands of the banks, and if it belongs anywhere put it in the hands of the United States Government—certainly not in the hands of a set of men who at that time did "bulldoze" this nation and this Congress. There is no doubt about that. [Applause.]

Mr. CRAPO. My inquiry is this: Did not the withdrawal of that $18,000,000 of currency, whether from fear or according to the gentleman's view as a threat, affect disastrously the monetary affairs of the country for a while?

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, my friend has had much more experience upon this question than I have had. If he says that it did, I take his statement. I have no doubt it would have that effect, for this reason: it would be, in my notion, exactly analogous to the example of a dozen banks; when one of them breaks you look out for the rest. In this case you find, let the motive be what it may, that a contraction is suddenly and unexpectedly produced, it takes place in a flash, showing that somebody is losing confidence. The inevitable effect must be to make other men doubtful. This alone would account for a lack of confidence everywhere.

But the point which I think the gentleman wants to make is this: that whenever there is a contraction there must be a shaking of confidence. I do not see the matter in that light at all. Suppose that this bill be not passed. Suppose the country knows months beforehand that on the 25th of February, 1883, two hundred and ninety-seven banks must go into liquidation, and must retire $54,000,000 of currency. The point of my friend is that because so much currency is to be retired therefore everybody would lose confidence and there would be a panic all over the country. I think not, for this reason: we know months beforehand that this retirement of currency and the consequent contraction is to take place. Therefore we are not shaken at all. It does not disturb my confidence in my banker, or your confidence in your merchant, or anybody's confidence in real estate. Why? Because you know beforehand that this withdrawal of circulation must come and that it will be but temporary. The idea that a mere contraction necessarily produces a lack of confidence and a panic seems even to me, who am not at all a financier, very absurd.

Mr. HASELTINE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. ANDERSON. With pleasure.

Mr. HASELTINE. Could not Congress protect the people against any damage from contraction of the currency by authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue legal tenders equal to the amount of contraction caused by the withdrawal of the bank-note circulation?

Mr. ANDERSON. Most undoubtedly. And in the last Congress I introduced as an amendment to the funding bill a proposition that currency notes, not legal tenders, be issued by the Government in the denominations and to the amount of the retired national-bank notes. Most undoubtedly any contraction could be prevented in that way, if it were necessary.

But the question is whether you have not money enough to-day. Is it not quite probable—to my mind I am frank to say that it is certain—that the danger to the country to-day is not from having too little money, but because we have too much? In other words, I believe that a contraction, so far as it goes, will do good. But, as I said, I am not a financier.

Mr. HASELTINE. May I ask the gentleman another question?

Mr. ANDERSON. With pleasure.

Mr. HASELTINE. Has the gentleman in his experience or observation ever known a community that suffered from too much money?

Mr. ANDERSON. Well, yes. I hope my friend makes the distinction between property and money. Money is simply a tool with which to effect exchanges and settle balances. Whenever money becomes so plentiful that you cannot obtain a fair interest for it—when the rate of interest runs down, we will say, to 1 per cent. per annum—when nobody is willing to pay anything for the use of money—then I fancy you have too much of it.

If my friend means to ask whether I ever saw a country where the people had too much property, where each individual had too much wealth, I am very frank to say, Mr. Speaker, in looking at my own sad experience I never saw that country or that individual. But there is a vast difference between property on the one side and money on the other. Money is simply a convenient instrument with which you settle the balance of your exchanges. It serves as a wheelbarrow; that is all your money is or does.

Mr. HASELTINE. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him another question?

Mr. ANDERSON. With pleasure.

Mr. HASELTINE. Do not the political economists understand to-day distinctly that it is high-priced money in the United States which prevents our maintaining our shipping upon the high seas in competition with the cheap money of other countries?

Mr. ANDERSON. My friend asks for my opinion as to the views of political economists on that point. Of course I may be mistaken, but my opinion is that the real reason why we have no commerce on the high seas is because somebody else is carrying our freights cheaper than you will carry them. It is because the wages of the European sailor are cheaper than those of the American sailor, and because English mechanics in ship-yards work for lower wages than do our mechanics

Mr. HASELTINE. Is it not because of the cheap money and cheap labor of other countries?

Mr. ANDERSON. I think the trouble is not as to the cheap money, but mainly because of cheaper labor.

Now, Mr. Speaker, returning to the alleged danger of contraction, I desire to suggest again that the present supply of money is more than sufficient for a safe business. I do not say it is more than sufficient for financial skylarking, which inevitably results in ruin, but it is sufficient for safe, prudent, legitimate business. You had on hand November 1, 1881, $562,568,971 of gold, $186,037,365 of silver, $346,681,016 of legal tenders, and $360,344,250 of bank notes, an aggregate of $1,455,631,602. Certainly that is money enough for the transaction of 6 per cent. of the whole business of the country. The trouble with me is that I have nothing to sell. There is money enough scattered around if I only had something to exchange for it. And my point in reply to the alleged danger of contraction is simply this: the gentlemen advocating this bill say that the withdrawal of $60,000,000 of currency for a few weeks will produce a panic. What percentage is that $60,000,000 of the $1,455,000,000 of gold, silver, and notes? It is somewhere about 4 per cent., and if this nation has gotten into such a tremulous condition that the withdrawal of less than 4 per cent. of that which it uses as money will produce a panic, then in God's name let us have a panic, because then we must be financially rotten. I am not frightened a particle by this bugbear of contraction, even if it were more than a myth. But the fact is that the withdrawal of so small a relative amount will not produce contraction. After your 393 banks have withdrawn their circulation there are 1,700 other national banks which remain and can increase their issues. If bank notes are scarce, men will willingly pay for them. The existing banks will make money by increasing their issue, and the result will be that this increased issue will prevent contraction.

Then comes the final proposition, that the vast bulk of the exchanges of the country do not depend on the amount or kind of money you have, but that 94 or 95 per cent. of your exchanges are effected by your drafts and checks and your credits on books.

Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the naked issue presented by this bill is an issue between the owners and the officers of the present national banks on the one side, and the American Congress with a Republican majority on the other. The Republican party, as the father and defender of our national banking system, is bound by all its traditions to oppose this issue. There is the only point. And when gentlemen come here and, alleging this to be a Republican measure, ask me as a Republican to support it or to observe silence, I utterly deny their allegation and protest against so gross an attempt to use the party for such a purpose. I prefer to be a Republican of the old and true school. When you unearth this scheme you find that it is the owners and the officers of the banks attacking the grandest financial system the country has ever seen, and for which the Republican party is responsible. That is all there is of it, in my judgment.

Mr. HASELTINE. Will the gentleman let me ask him another question?

Mr. ANDERSON. Certainly.

Mr. HASELTINE. Did not the Republican party give us the greenbacks?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. HASELTINE. Could we not afford to get more of them to fill up any contraction caused by the withdrawal of the national banks?

Mr. ANDERSON. My friend and I differ about the danger of contraction. I have no apprehension of it. We have more money than we need; but if the gentleman will reproduce the circumstances under which the greenback was given to the country he will find that the same vivid patriotism would recreate the greenback. That note was simply the pledge of the nation, in the hour of its dire distress and poverty, that some day, no man could say when, but somewhere along the line of an unknown future, it would redeem its promise to pay the dollars named. It was only the evidence of the plighted honor of a great nation to repay money borrowed. And in due time every syllable and letter of that promise was made good. That was the greenback, a Republican every inch of him, from the inner soul, glowing with patriotism and integrity, to the hair of his head, now golden with the halo of faith perfectly kept and pledges fully redeemed, as you look at him in history.

But my friend will excuse me for saying that this greenback is not what I think is in his mind when he talks of "fiat" money. It was simply the nation's note given for the payment of its obligations, as my own note or the note of any other individual would be given.

Mr. HASELTINE. Has not the Supreme Court of the United States, the highest tribunal in the country, decided that it was the lawful right of the American Congress to stamp any material in its possession in peace or in war as its currency?

Mr. ANDERSON. I do not now remember what the Supreme Court may have done in that connection. My present familiarity with its utterances is derived from a recent reading of some decisions in railroad cases, and I then thought that somebody ought to have pounded into that august body either some common sense or common honesty. I do not care what they say one way or the other as to the power of a nation to issue fiat money. But the greenback was simply a note to pay the obligations of the nation; and if ever again in the history of this country a period should come similar to that which called forth the greenback, you will find the same faith and the same credit given to it that the Republican party gave to it in the days when it was first issued. But that day is not here now. This nation does not need to issue a depreciated currency at this time. The simple point in this bill is whether you shall give to these national banks an indefinite life and save to them many millions of dollars, and that is the whole of it.

But to be frank with the gentleman and answer his question more fully, I will say that there are three functions which may be exercised by banks: first, that of discount and deposit; second, that of exchange; and, third, that of issue. So far as continuing the national banks as banks of deposit and of exchange, I do not believe that any country will ever have a better system than the present. None can be better for the customer and the whole people.

But I am frank to say that in all sincerity I question the policy or wisdom of this Government giving to anybody, to the banks or to anybody, the power to issue paper that shall be used as money. And I would infinitely rather see a piece of paper issued as a Goverament note, payable on demand by the United States Government, backed by its resources, to be made good by its integrity, than I would the notes of any bank, though supported and secured by the promise of the Government to make them good in the event of failure by the bank.

Mr. BURROWS, of Missouri. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. ANDERSON. With pleasure.

Mr. BURROWS, of Missouri. The Government issues the legal-tender notes, does it not?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. BURROWS, of Missouri. The Government also issues the national-bank notes?

Mr. ANDERSON. No, sir; the banks issue them.

Mr. BURROWS, of Missouri. They do?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. BURROWS, of Missouri. I supposed it was the Government.

Mr. ANDERSON. The Government prints them.

Mr. BURROWS, of Missouri. Well, the Government is responsible for them. Now I want to know what is the difference between a note issued directly to the people by the Government or indirectly through these corporations?

Mr. ANDERSON. In time of peace, none; but in times of war an immense difference, as our experience proved.

Mr. BURROWS, of Missouri. Then, another question. In what is the national-bank note redeemable, in coin?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes, practically, now, and if the Government has no greenbacks.

Mr. BURROWS, of Missouri. Then it is redeemable in greenbacks?

Mr. ANDERSON. It is redeemable in the lawful money of the nation.

Mr. BURROWS, of Missouri. Can you demand coin?

Mr. ANDERSON. Strictly you can only demand legal-tender notes. When these are at par you can demand coin, so that now you could demand and receive either greenbacks, silver, or gold. But when the greenback was at a discount you could not demand coin from the Government in redemption of a bank note. It was just this fact which makes the vast difference between war and peace periods.

Mr. HOLMAN addressed the House. [See Appendix.]

Mr. HARDENBERGH obtained the floor, and yielded to

Mr. CRAPO, who moved that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at nine o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and other papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. ERRETT: The letter of Thomas A. Douglass, relative to the bill for the relief of sufferers by the explosion of the Allegheny arsenal in 1862—to the Committee on Claims.

Also, the petition of manufacturers and dealers of matches of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, in opposition to the proposed repeal of the tax on matches—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. HOGE: The petition of William Gray and others, citizens of Marion County, West Virginia, asking an appropriation for educational purposes—to the Committee on Education and Labor.

By Mr. MOREY: Papers relating to the claim of Barrington Behymer—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. SPARKS: The joint resolutions adopted by the Legislature of Illinois, in relation to the imprisonment of American citizens in British jails—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. WARD: The petition of honorably discharged soldiers and sailors of Delaware County, Pennsylvania, for the enactment of a law granting to soldiers and sailors of the late war bounty in money in lieu of bounty land-warrants—to the Select Committee on the Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, May 17, 1882.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report from Captain William Ludlow, Corps of Engineers, of an examination of Indian River, Delaware, from its mouth to Millsborough, made in compliance with provisions in the river and harbor act of March 3, 1881; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia, presented a petition of citizens of Circleville, Pendleton County, West Virginia, praying for an appropriation by the General Government to aid free schools in the States; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. HARRISON presented a petition of ex soldiers and sailors of Indiana, praying for the passage of the House bill granting one hundred and sixty acres of land to each of the volunteer soldiers of the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SHERMAN. I present the petition of Mrs. Betty B. Bassett, of the State of Virginia, setting out that she is the owner by descent of the family Bible of the father of George Washington, which is undoubtedly true. She desires to sell it to Congress at such price as they may think proper to allow her, stating that she thinks so interesting a memento should be owned by the Government and that her circumstances are rather necessitous for her to donate it. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on the Library.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BROWN. I present a petition of citizens of Gilmer County, Georgia, in favor of a liberal appropriation for the education of the people of the different States, and as it is very short I ask consent that it be read.

The petition was read, and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, as follows:

We, the undersigned, citizens of the county of Gilmer, State of Georgia, deeply impressed with the dangers which threaten our institutions because of the appalling illiteracy of the voting population, as revealed in the last census, for the enlightenment of whom many of the States are unable to make adequate provision, and believing it to be the duty of Congress to provide for the public safety no less in time of peace than in time of war, and that the enfranchisement of the freedmen by the United States Government imposes upon that Government the obligation to afford liberal aid to the States in their effort to prepare this class of citizens for the duties of citizenship, do earnestly pray that our Senators and Representatives in Congress assembled will take prompt and efficient measures to avert this danger; that moneys raised in adequate amount, and from such sources as Congress may, in its wisdom, deem best, shall be distributed among the States and Territories on the basis of illiteracy and for the support of common schools conducted under local laws, under such guarantees as shall secure their application to this object, with equal justice to all classes of citizens.

Mr. BLAIR presented a resolution of the city government of Manchester, New Hampshire, praying for an appropriation to improve the navigation of the Merrimac River in accordance with the report of General Thom, United States Engineers; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the memorial of Andrew J. Chambers, praying the passage of the bill providing for a commission of colored citizens to inquire into the condition of their race in this country; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. JACKSON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 190) to refer certain claims to the Court of Claims, reported it without amendment; and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I am instructed by the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 5387) providing for the pay of Rear-Admiral Roger N. Stembel, to report it favorably. A bill similar to this was heretofore reported by me from the same committee. I ask that that bill be indefinitely postponed, and that the bill now reported be placed on the Calendar in lieu thereof. The Senate bill was passed over without prejudice the other day when it was reached on the Calendar.

The bill (S. No. 339) providing for the pay of Rear-Admiral Roger N. Stembel, was indefinitely postponed.

Mr. ROLLINS. What position will the bill now reported occupy on the Calendar?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection it will take the same place on the Calendar as the bill which was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. ROLLINS. I do not know that I have any objection to that, but I should like to be present when the matter is called up for consideration.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I certainly shall interpose no objection to the presence of the Senator from New Hampshire. He can be present if he wishes.

Mr. ROLLINS. I fear my objection would not avail if I were present; but I should like to have the Senator refrain from calling the bill up when I am not present. I am generally here.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I want it understood that I enter into no obligation to that effect.

Mr. ROLLINS. Very well. Then I object to the bill being placed on the Calendar in the place occupied by the bill which was indefinitely postponed. The bill will then go to the foot of the Calendar, where it belongs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida had better accede to the request of the Senator from New Hampshire and agree not to take up the bill in his absence.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Has the Senator from New Hampshire a right to object to this bill taking the place I suggested?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He can object to such an arrangement, in which case the bill must go to the foot of the Calendar.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I do not think that I ever called up in the Senator's absence any matter that he indicated he had an interest in.

Mr. ROLLINS. I knew the Senator is so courteous always that he would extend to me that courtesy.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire withdraws his objection.

Mr. ROLLINS. The Senator served notice upon me that he would not extend that courtesy to me, and therefore I interposed the objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The objection having been withdrawn, the bill reported by the Senator from Florida will be placed on the Calendar at the place occupied by the bill which was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. FARLEY, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 686) to regulate the appointment of sailmakers in the United States Navy, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. SLATER, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1332) for the relief of the Delaware Indians in accordance with treaty stipulations, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. DAWES. I am instructed by the Committee on Indian Affairs to report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. No. 5004) to accept and ratify an agreement with the Shoshone and Bannock Indians for the sale of a portion of their reservation in Idaho Territory required for the use of the Utah and Northern Railroad, and to make the necessary appropriation for carrying out the same.

Mr. HAWLEY. I should like to give notice that I shall ask the Senate in a few days to consider the bill just reported.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 927) for the relief of J. T. Pickett, reported it without amendment; and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. McPHERSON, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1578) to regulate the promotion of graduates from the Naval Academy, and appointments in the staff corps in the Navy, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment.

Mr. HOAR, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of James B. Crank and George Hoffman, citizens of Washington, praying compensation for use and occupation of their property by the Army during the war, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was ordered to be printed; and the committee were discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 910) for the relief of Bayse N. Westcott, reported it without amendment; and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 879) authorizing the President of the United States to reappoint Stephen A. McCarty a lieutenant-commander in the Navy, reported it without amendment; and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 61) tendering the thanks of Congress to and conferring additional rank on Chief Engineer George W. Melville, United States Navy, and for other purposes, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was ordered to be printed; and the joint resolution was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. HAMPTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1749) for the relief of William McNamara, reported it with an amendment; and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. VANCE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Daniel S. Mershon, jr., for balance of contract on account of building the gun-boat Mingoe, reported a bill (S. No. 1892) for the relief of Daniel S. Mershon, jr.; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. VEST, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3858) to provide for the construction of a public building at Galveston, Texas, reported it without amendment.

SIXTH NORTH CAROLINA COLLECTION DISTRICT.

Mr. VANCE, from the select committee on the sixth collection district of North Carolina, reported the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the necessary expenses of the special committee authorized by the Senate resolution of April 21, 1882, to investigate the administration of the collection of internal revenue in the sixth district of North Carolina, &c., be paid out of the appropriation for special and select committees.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolutions; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 3542) for the relief of Charles F. Benjamin and Henry H. Smith;

A bill (H. R. No. 5575) providing for a public building at Jackson, Tennessee;

A bill (H. R. No. 6179) directing the Secretary of State to take the necessary steps for the removal of the remains of the late General Kilpatrick, minister to Chili, from Chili to the State of New Jersey for interment;

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 67) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan one hundred flags to the mayor and committee of citizens of Charlotte, North Carolina;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 111) authorizing the withdrawal from the Department of State of a certificate of indebtedness in favor of Mifflin Kennedy and Richard King against the Republic of Mexico; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 211) to authorize the Librarian of Congress to accept the library offered to be donated to the United States by Dr. Joseph Merideth Toner, of Washington, District of Columbia.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HAWLEY asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1893) to extend the benefits of section 4 of "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1866," approved March 3, 1865; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HALE asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1894) to extend the provisions of Senate bill No. 1783 so as to embrace wire-rope already imported; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CHILCOTT asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1895) restoring to the public domain certain lands heretofore claimed as portions of the Saint Vrain and Vigil grant, in the State of Colorado; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. INGALLS (by request) asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1896) to authorize the Court of Claims of the United States to ascertain the amount of damage sustained by Ann C. Carroll and Maria C. Fitzhugh, executrixes of the estate of Daniel Carroll, of Duddington, deceased, by the regrading of the streets around square No. 736, in the city of Washington; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. GROOME asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1897) for the relief of First Lieutenant Redmond Tully; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. JONAS asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 68) authorizing a survey of a route for a ship-channel and harbor on the Mississippi River at New Orleans, Louisiana; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

AMENDMENT TO A BILL.

Mr. ROLLINS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. No. 1402) for the relief of shipping; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

LUCRETIA V. WEBSTER.

Mr. ROLLINS submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Acting Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay out of the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate to Mrs. Lucretia G. Webster, widow of William E. Webster, deceased, late an assistant engineer of the Senate, the sum of $720, being an amount equal to six months' salary as assistant engineer aforesaid; the above sum to be considered as including the funeral expenses and all other allowances.

PENSIONS TO SOLDIERS OF MEXICAN AND INDIAN WARS.

Mr. CALL. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Pensions are hereby instructed to report on Senate bill granting a pension to the survivors of the Mexican and Indian wars prior to the year 1848.

Mr. ALLISON. Let that resolution go over.

Mr. PLATT. The resolution will be printed, I suppose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be printed, and it goes over under the rule.

GRAIN STEAM-SHOVEL PATENT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business, the morning hour is declared closed.

Mr. COCKRELL. Regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Bills on the Calendar under the Anthony rule will be called.

Mr. PLATT. I ask the Senate to consider again the bill which was under consideration yesterday morning, Senate bill No. 1057, for the extension of a patent. It seems to me it is better that the bill should be taken up and disposed of while it is fresh in the minds of Senators.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1057) for the relief of George Milsom, Henry Spendelow, and George V. Watson, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. COCKRELL to add to the bill:

And provided further, That any and all persons who may have purchased, constructed, or become the owners of such machinery, or any part thereof, since the expiration of the patent and prior to the passage of this act, shall have the right to use the same without liability for royalty or damage, and without interference on the part of the patentees, their executors, administrators, or assigns.

Mr. COCKRELL. The report has been read.

Mr. LAPHAM. Mr. President, I desire to make a single suggestion to the Senator from Missouri in regard to the pending amendment. No such amendment as this is necessary, for the simple reason——

Mr. COCKRELL. If the Senator will permit me one moment, I was going to modify the amendment in a way which may meet his objection.

Mr. LAPHAM. I desire to suggest that there is no occasion for any amendment on that point. No law which we can pass will affect any right which has been secured to an individual since the expiration of the former patent and before the passage of the present bill. All vested rights, of course, we cannot interfere with. There is no occasion whatever for this amendment, and the difficulty and danger of the amendment are that it will be construed as providing a much broader protection than the law furnishes to intervening rights of innocent persons. This bill is not retroactive; it can only take effect from the time it becomes a law; and all persons who have acquired rights of any description since the expiration of the former patent must be protected in those rights, notwithstanding any bill we may pass. This amendment is wholly useless.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I should like to ask the Senator from New York how long this right will continue, if the patent is renewed, from the date of its extension?

Mr. LAPHAM. If vested, it will continue as long as they choose to exercise it. It is a vested right, and we cannot impair it.

Mr. MCMILLAN. If it is a vested right, we cannot.

Mr. COCKRELL. The reason why I offered the amendment is apparent. The patent has expired; persons may have invested their money in this machinery and have it now in operation. The patent will be extended, and those parties will be subject to litigation. The Senator from New York knows that just as well as I do. Every man who knows anything about patent-right litigation knows that such persons will not be permitted to use the patent-right without a controversy and a lawsuit.

I want to test the friends of this bill and see if they are in earnest. They say that the patent-right is used only in Buffalo, New York. The Senator from New York and his colleague represent that State. If the people of Buffalo want this patent-right extended, I am willing to exclude Buffalo from this amendment, so that it will only apply to portions of the country outside of Buffalo. If it is used anywhere else, there will be simply protection elsewhere. I am willing to make the amendment exclude all persons in Buffalo.

Mr. PLATT. There is already in this bill the usual protecting clause that no one shall be liable for any infringement of the patent between the time of its expiration and the time when it shall be extended by the Commissioner of Patents, if it ever shall be extended. Of course the extension will date from the time when the Commissioner of Patents shall extend it, if upon the hearing he shall find that it ought to be extended.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is not the point I am making.

Mr. PLATT. All persons are protected against the payment of any royalty or any damages for infringement between the expiration of the patent and the time of its extension. That is the usual clause.

The Senator asks also to have an amendment put on the bill which will give a monopoly of this patent not to the patentees, not to any persons who may make arrangements with the patentees for its use, but to anybody who may have gone forward and made any arrangements to use it after the expiration of the patent or with reference to the extension of the patent.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then I understand that the Senator from Connecticut occupies just the reverse of the position of the Senator from New York, and says boldly, just as I say, that this will be no protection to such a man.

Mr. PLATT. I have not said anything of the sort as yet. I say that is the object of the Senator's amendment. He desires that if any persons have, pending this application for an extension, in view of it or not knowing of it, made any arrangements for the use of the patent, they shall have the right to use it without payment of royalty, while all other persons will be compelled to pay royalty.

We may just as well understand this matter. I did not suppose yesterday that any persons had made any arrangements for the use of it. I am told since yesterday that the Pennsylvania Railroad Company has made some arrangements looking to the use of this patent in an elevator either at Buffalo or at Erie, or perhaps at both places; so that the amendment of the Senator from Missouri is an amendment to allow the Pennsylvania Railroad Company to use the patent without payment of royalty, while the other elevator owners in Buffalo, Erie, Oswego, and wherever else it may be used, will pay, as they are perfectly willing to do, royalty to the patentees. That is the precise situation, and that will be the effect, as I understand it, of the amendment of the Senator from Missouri. I see no reason why they should be protected any more than the parties who already have their elevators in use, who will continue to pay the royalty which they have heretofore paid, and do so willingly. In the case of persons who have sought to take advantage of the expiration of this patent, (I do not know how much they have done, I presume very little, but enough undoubtedly to say that they have made arrangements looking to the future use of it,) I know of no reason why they should not come in with the others, and if the patent is extended pay all the royalty to the patentees which the others will pay.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, it is very seldom that I have occasion to differ with my colleague, and least of all upon subjects of this character, with which he is so well acquainted; but I feel bound to oppose not the amendment but the whole measure.

I have had sent to me from a firm in my vicinity, a very respectable, prominent firm dealing in Western produce, a strong protest against the bill, accompanied by an elaborate brief. The brief represents the Anchor Line, the Union Steamboat Company, the Western Transportation Company, the Lehigh Valley Transportation Company, the Commercial line, V. B. Fortier, Smith & Davis, Samuel L. Watson, William G. Winslow, James McBrier & Co., J. C. Van Scoter, Levi Davis, and others, who say that their aggregate annual grain-carrying capacity is equal to about eight-tenths of the entire annual receipts of grain at the port of Buffalo. They make a very strong protest against this extension. They say that the patentees have had a reasonable compensation, that a very large sum of money has been paid besides to assignees who enjoyed the benefit of the patent during a portion of the time, and that the amount paid has been a burden upon the public. The invention has been of no utility yet because of the imposition of the royalty; the entire benefit has been assumed by the people at Buffalo, and by the grain-shovelers themselves, whose association has held a sort of despotic veto over this question.

The inventors, the original patentees, received—these are their figures, quoted by the opponents of the extension—$38,703.28. Deducting expenses, according to the statement of the patentees, which the objectors are not able to question in detail, they have had a net profit of $18,353, or $2,000 a year, during the years they have enjoyed it. They have not enjoyed it all the time, because they assigned it to other persons for reasons best known to themselves. I will quote the brief literally:

Upon the petitioners' own showing the public paid in royalties, for grain shoveled at the port of Buffalo alone, from 1877 to 1881, inclusive, $137,000, and it is a matter of absolute mathematical demonstration that during the lives of these patents royalties have been paid, either to the patentees or to their assignees, equal to $250,000.

It is said that an extension of the patent for seven years would be a benefit to the holders of about five hundred thousand dollars, as near as they can estimate, because they say 1,000,000,000 bushels is a moderate estimate of the probable grain trade to Buffalo during the seven years, and at the rate of fifty cents a thousand bushels the royalties would aggregate at least half a million dollars. Therefore the objectors, the opponents of this extension, declare that the holders of the patent have already received a sufficient compensation.

Whether the benefits have been divided as we should like to have them divided is quite another question. That is in no sense the fault of the Government or of the public in general, or of the dealers in grain, or of anybody else except the parties selves. They held the patent nine years and transferred it to others who have had a larger benefit than the patentees, though the patentees had $18,000.

It does not appear, and we cannot make it appear on this bill, so far as I know, that the original patentees will have the exclusive benefit of the extension. We do not know but that they have already promised this patent. It is often done. It may be done owing to their necessities. It may be that somebody has already obtained a contract from them for this extension in case it shall be granted. I mean by that to say that it is utterly impossible for us to secure an equitable division of the benefits of any such patent under any circumstances, either in the original grant or in an extension, and that a sufficient sum having been given by the public for the use of this invention during the seventeen years' life of the patent, there is no equity in our granting an extension of it. It is one of the claims on the part of the petitioners that they were prevented by the obstinate opposition of the unions, the trade associations of shovelers, at certain points from introducing their invention. This is the statement:

That they made special efforts to introduce the said shovel in the cities of New York, Philadelphia, Erie, and Oswego, but without avail; that in each of said cities they met with the violent and persistent opposition of the grain-shovelers, and to such an extent that they were finally compelled to abandon the idea of introducing the said shovel at all in the said cities.

That is believed to be an error, not to say misrepresentation, for I have here affidavits from a number of firms in each of the places mentioned who are engaged in the business of handling grain, and in some cases they are the sole owners and managers of elevators, who make affidavits that so far as they know no attempt was ever made to introduce the shoveler at those points, and certainly no opposition could have been made; that they never heard of any objection to it. The first one is from the superintendent of the Washington street grain-elevator at Washington avenue wharf in Philadelphia, which is owned by the Pennsylvania Railroad Company. This deponent quotes the paragraph in the petition which I have read, and says that no such effort as described was made to introduce the said steam-shovel, and no such violation or other opposition of hand-shovelers there occurred.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. HAWLEY. What shall I do, Mr. President?

Mr. INGALLS. Let it be extended by consent.

Mr. HAWLEY. I hope nobody will make any objection to my proceeding for just a moment longer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there unanimous consent to the extension of the time of the Senator from Connecticut for five minutes longer? The Chair hears no objection and the Senator has five minutes longer.

Mr. HAWLEY. There is a series of affidavits here which, without taking the time of the Senate in reading, I will submit, if desired, to those who advocate the bill. The first one, which I have quoted already, is from the superintendent of the Washington street grain-elevator in Philadelphia, which represents the Pennsylvania Railroad Company. The next is from the manager of that same elevator, who makes the same assertion, that there was never an attempt to introduce the shovel at that elevator, and there was never any factious opposition. Here is another from the superintending engineer of Girard Point grain-elevator, who makes the same statement. There is another one from the superintendent of the Girard Point elevator.

Mr. PLATT. Will my colleague permit me to make a single assertion?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. PLATT. Of course there never has been any objection or resistance to the introduction of this shoveler in Philadelphia and the other points which my colleague speaks of, because it has not been introduced there and has not been attempted to be introduced there, and for the very reason that it is not applicable to introduction at those points, as I suggested yesterday.

Mr. HAWLEY. Nevertheless these firms largely engaged in the forwarding of grain and other produce do protest against the renewal of the patent.

But that is not all. Here is a protest from the city of Erie—and certainly that is a port which might use the shovel—here is a protest from the eastern manager of the Lake grain elevator, situated on the lake front, Erie Harbor, Pennsylvania, and owned by the Erie and Western Transportation Company. He quotes the statement of the petitioners that they were violently opposed by the hand-shovelers, and says:

> Deponent further says that no such effort as described was made to introduce the said steam-shovel at the elevator aforesaid, and no such violent or other opposition of hand-shovelers there occurred.

I think there is one also from an elevator owner in the city of New York. Here is a list of those who make a similar statement, and indeed, I think, each statement is supported by an affidavit:

Edward Annan, president International Grain Elevator Association;

L. B. Shaw, president Grain Warehouse Company;

Ira Ketcham, secretary United States Warehouse Company;

Franklin Woodruff, owner of Woodruff elevator;

J. P. Robinson, manager Erie Basin elevator;

Edward L. Kelley, superintendent Brooklyn Central elevator;

Francis E. Pinto, owner of the two Pinto elevators;

R. H. Hazeltine, lessee of the Dows, Kelsey, and Columbia elevators;

Milton Knapp, owner of the floating elevators J. S. Brown and Telegraph;

George D. Puffer, president New York Floating Elevator Association.

My colleague made the point that the patent shoveler cannot be used at some of these places. That is true enough, for it is adapted only to use in the case of barges and other floating means of transportation. It runs down into the hold of a vessel and assists in gathering the grain through the little buckets that run up to the high stories of the elevators; it assists in scooping in the grain to the shovel, so that it is not in use at the termini of railroads where the wheat comes in cars, but is in use in all sea-ports or lake-ports where the wheat comes to the port in barges or in canal-boats.

Mr. LAPHAM. No, it cannot be used in unloading canal-boats.

Mr. HAWLEY. If your patentees say so, it is so, probably; but I see no reason from the statement of the patent why it cannot be used in canal-boats.

Mr. LAPHAM. Because they are so light that the motion will not permit it to be done. That is fully certified to.

Mr. HAWLEY. It is used in barges, sloops, and so on, for assisting in lifting the grain to high elevators. It has been claimed in behalf of this bill that the transportation of grain will be no cheaper even if this extension should be refused, and the reason given is that the hand-shovelers will come right in and take the position they held before, and will arbitrarily control, as some of these unions try to do, all the handling of the grain, and that nobody who takes this steam-shovel, then open to the public, will be able to use it to any profit because this mob of hand-shovelers will insist on dividing all the profit there may be in it, and therefore the public will get no benefit.

In the first place, in answer to that I have to say that these people, largely dealing in the transportation of grain, and vigorously protesting, insist that to refuse to renew this patent, which has been reasonably paid for, will tend to the reduction of the price of grain, and certainly my State and all of us in the East have an interest in the cheap transportation of grain. It is an absurdity on its face, I submit respectfully, to claim that the taking off any tax of that description will not soon inure to the benefit of the general public.

That is substantially all I have to say. There is nothing specially novel in this. There has been not less than $250,000, I think, distributed among assignees and patentees, and to extend the patent seven years longer, on a moderate estimate will levy $500,000 tax at the port of Buffalo alone, and therefore I submit that the renewal ought not to be granted.

Mr. GROOME. Mr. President, I have found on examination that I was correct in the impression which I stated to the Senate yesterday that I had received from influential sources in Baltimore objections of a very strong nature to the passage of the legislation proposed by this bill. The Corn and Flour Exchange of that city have sent to the Committee on Patents of the House of Representatives, and also to the Senators from Maryland, their protest against the proposed legislation. Individuals and firms of Baltimore City connected with the grain trade have written to me in earnest and forcible language stating their objections to this legislation which they claim will be an onerous tax upon commerce and upon vessel owners; and they claim, as has been stated by the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY,] that the royalty on this patent from the one port of Buffalo alone must have produced, at the rate of fifty cents upon the thousand bushels, some $250,000 to these patentees or their assignees. They object strenuously to the renewal of the patent, which will prevent them from using the patented article or any of the mechanical inventions which are covered by it, for the period of seven years in the future and perhaps for such further time as Congress may hereafter in its excessive generosity choose to extend the patent.

I will not attempt to discuss the merits of this bill, and in fact could not do so, under the five-minute rule. I will content myself with saying that I regard the legislation which it proposes as very bad. Seventeen years is long enough to give to any patentee the right to the exclusive use or sale of his invention, and whether or not during that time he has obtained what he regards as ample remuneration for the labor, skill, and expense incurred by him in originating and perfecting it, at the expiration of that period it should be thrown open to the general public, and they should have the opportunity to avail themselves of its benefits.

In order that the views of those of my constituents who are engaged in the grain trade in Baltimore, as to the impropriety of the proposed legislation, may be understood, I send to the Clerk's desk the resolutions of the Corn and Flour Exchange of Baltimore, and ask that they may be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolutions will be read.

The Acting Secretary read as follows:

MARCH 30, 1882.

At a general meeting of the members of the Baltimore Corn and Flour Exchange this day the following preamble and resolutions were unanimously adopted, to wit:

Whereas it has come to the knowledge of the Baltimore Corn and Flour Exchange that application has been made to Congress for an extension of the steam grain-shovel patents granted to George Milsom, Henry Spendelow, and George V. Watson; and

Whereas the said patents have been in use for a long period, and have been an onerous tax upon the transportation of grain over the great water-ways of the country, and have resulted in large profits to the owners of said patents: Therefore, in consideration of the largely increasing competition that the United States is experiencing with foreign countries for supplying grain to consuming market,

Be it resolved, That this exchange respectfully protests against the extension of the above named patent; and

Be it further resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be telegraphed to the Committee on Patents of the House of Representatives and to our Senators and Representatives now in Congress.

WM. F. WHEATLEY, Secretary.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. Mr. President, I have no doubt that all the grain-transportation companies, and all the railroad companies, and all the boards of produce and flour exchanges in Baltimore and elsewhere in this country are opposed to the extension of this patent, and to the extension of any patent, the result of which will be to take any money out of their treasuries; but that, as I understand the question of patents, has nothing whatever to do with this case. The only question to be considered is whether the inventors, who have undoubtedly, as it is admitted by all these transportation companies, produced a most valuable invention, have been properly and justly compensated for their labor and inventive genius. That is the only question I conceive with which we have anything to do. It is not whether the Pennsylvania Railroad Company or whether the grain-transportation companies of this country desire this patent to be extended or not; and their protests upon this question should have nothing to do whatever with our votes or our judgments.

The Committee on Patents have reported from sworn affidavits and an examination of the accounts that the entire profits accruing to the persons who have built and put in successful operation this steam machinery is the sum of $18,353.28. I submit to any candid man, to any man who thinks that inventive genius should be properly compensated, that this is no compensation at all for an invention which has reduced the price of handling grain wherever it has been introduced. Sir, instead of this patent having been so far a tax on the public it has been no tax at all. It is shown by the testimony before the committee that the cost of handling grain in Buffalo with this machinery is cheaper than it was before. Therefore it has absolutely thus far in its course benefited the entire country and the people who consume grain.

The only question, I submit, is whether they have been properly compensated. Printed statements have been read here about which I know nothing, and which, if they had been presented at all, should have been presented to the Committee on Patents, stating that some two or three hundred thousand dollars of profits have been made. We have the sworn statements of the persons interested that their profits are only, in round numbers, $18,000, all of which has been used up in constructing this new invention and bringing it into use.

Mr. HAWLEY. They say they made $18,000 profit during the nine years they held it. That does not cover the eight years the patent was held by the assignees.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. The patent is not to be extended for the benefit of the assignees. We have no right to assume that it is to be extended for the benefit of the assignees. Under our patent laws it cannot be so extended. It is extended in the name of and to the inventors, and when it has been so extended, of course they can do what they please with it. We have no right to assume here that they have made any bargain which will give it away to assignees or to railroad companies or transportation companies. We have a right to presume that it is for their benefit. The profits have been, as I have stated, $18,000, which is a mere bagatelle in comparison with the benefits which have already accrued to the entire people.

I do protest that these documents which are brought in here from the grain corporations of this country should have no weight in settling this question.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, the Committee on Patents investigated this case with very great care. The statements which have been made and read from papers prepared by others are entirely without foundation. I hold in my hand a sworn statement from the Union Elevator Company of Buffalo, signed and sworn to by Mr. D. S. Austin, vice-president of the Elevating Association, which states that since the expiration of this patent the whole quantity of grain and all the cargoes received at Buffalo have paid for shoveling $1 and $4.50 a thousand bushels, being an increase rather than a decrease in the charges upon elevating grain at Buffalo since the expiration of the patent. I hold in my hand also a sworn statement from Mr. Bennett, who I am informed is managing owner of Bennett's Union elevator, and also a statement of Mr. Kilterhouse, a prominent man in that business, connected with the transportation business, owning the largest number of vessels on the lakes as to carrying capacity, and a number of owners and shippers by the canal, large and respectable firms of Buffalo, all of which concur in the statement that so far from being an additional charge upon grain, it decreases the charges on grain to the shipper, to the transporter, and to the producer. So much for that. There is the sworn statement of the most respectable business firms in Buffalo, and the fact cannot be reasonably controverted, however positive and earnest may be the statement to the contrary.

Now as to the profits these men have received. They have never received on a fair account, after allowing them as a part of their expenses a reasonable amount for their time and labor, a cent. They are three poor men, with large families, and are laborers in an elevator, or millwrights in an elevator, poor men, requiring all their time and labor to take care of their families, and they devoted their nights and holidays and leisure time to the maturing of a valuable invention, with which, while before only some 4,000 bushels of grain to the hour were shoveled by hand labor, 20,000 bushels now can be delivered from vessels properly constructed.

Mr. COKE. Will the Senator allow me to ask him if the patentees of this invention have not enjoyed a monopoly of it for seventeen years?

Mr. CALL. I reply with great pleasure to my friend that they have not; that the provision of the Constitution which gives to Congress power to grant for a limited time to an inventor the exclusive right to his invention has failed, as the law often fails, in this case.

Mr. COKE. The report of the committee shows the invention to have been patented in 1864, and that the patent expired in 1881.

Mr. CALL. Yes; my friend has heard of making a promise to the ear and breaking it to the hope; but my friend is wrong in the asumption that because a patent-right is granted therefore there necessarily inures some advantage to the patentee.

These men made and matured this invention; they borrowed money from others to do it—$20,000, more or less, of time and expense; and estimating their time for the three years which they applied to this work at reasonable prices for skilled labor, as the Patents Committee always does, for maturing the patent up to the time it is granted, they have not received a cent. The public has paid nothing. The cost of shipment of grain to the producer and the merchant, as sworn to by these respectable gentlemen here and before the Patents Committee, has been decreased, certainly not increased, and to-day it is paid not by the public but by the elevator-men and the shovelers or hand-laborers.

Now, in regard to the compensation, this is an invention which cannot be used without the consent of the owners of the elevators; it is an attachment to the costly machinery used in elevators. The owners of the elevators refused for twelve years to use this new invention because of the opposition at first of the hand-shovelers, and they stipulated after a while in effect and substantially that if they would allow them to take it and make an agreement with the hand-shovelers by which they should receive $2 out of the $4 paid to the thousand bushels for handling grain they would charge $1.75 for the elevator and leave twenty-five cents per 1,000 bushels to the inventors. That was the practical agreement—$1.75 out of the $2, leaving twenty-five cents to the inventors. This was done in the form of a stock company named the Buffalo Steam Shoveling Company, in which the elevators took as a bonus or gratuity one-half of the stock, leaving the other half to the inventors to pay out of this twenty-five cents per thousand bushels which was allowed for the use of the steam-shovel to the inventors for $20,000 of expense and three years of night-work. This yielded them in the last year of the patent about $18,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's time is up.

Mr. CALL. I ask unanimous consent that I may be allowed to complete this explanation. ["Go on!"]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the Senator having five minutes longer? ["Go on!"] The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. CALL. These poor men had learned by practical observation as an elevator boss—I think that is the term—and millwrights in the elevators in Buffalo the needs of that kind of machinery; they worked up their own ideas and invented this new and useful invention. These elevator-men said to them after a long and painful struggle of twelve years of the life of the patent, "we will make an agreement with you to create a steam-shoveling company, and we will have you give us one-half the stock in that company and we will charge for the elevator $1.50 out of the $2 which the shovelers have agreed to allow us, and we will take for the half of the stock we have twenty-five cents, or one-half out of the remainder," thus allowing to these men as pay for all their expenses and for their invention the sum of twenty-five cents to the thousand bushels. Out of that sum they have received the bare amount of $18,000, not enough to compensate them for their time, estimated by the ordinary wages of a skilled workman for night-work engaged in that business, and they have made an invention which, as these gentlemen testify, has made Buffalo a great port of delivery and enabled grain to be transported by water in competition with the railroads, and with very great advantage to the whole producing interest of the country.

The laborers, the hand-shovelers, are here before the Patents Committee petitioning that this encouragement shall be given to men of their own number for this great discovery and this exercise of their inventive power. The laboring-men of Buffalo have asked that these poor men whose families are dependent on their earnings, with very limited means of support, shall have some advantage out of their labor; that while vast sums were being made by others out of their inventions who had money, these poor men and their families shall have some consideration from Senators and Congressmen that some opportunity of being compensated for their invention shall be given them. So the bill stood before the committee, the elevator-owners, and laboring men, and a number of the most respectable business men in the community testifying that there was no additional charge upon grain to the farmer, the shipper, or the vessel, but that it had decreased; there was no additional charge upon transportation; and the sole question for the committee to decide was whether or not they would give an opportunity to these inventors to have what they have not had under the law, the exclusive right to their invention for a period of time.

If there ever was a meritorious case, this is that case. There is not a single objection that can be found. The public pay nothing, the public are benefited, the elevators are benefited, and the laborers testify that they are benefited, and they all concur with the exception of a few persons who desire to take from these poor men any kind of compensation for their great contributions to the commerce of the port of Buffalo, and the value of their services. The opponents of this extension, when they vote against giving these poor men compensation for their labor, vote for giving their labor to the great railroad corporations of the country, and practically deny the right of every poor man in the country to be an inventor or to have the right to his invention.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. President, I have received several letters and have in my hand a remonstrance relating to the subject of the extension of this patent from ship-owners and gentlemen connected with elevators and with the grain business at Cleveland, Detroit, Port Huron, and other places on the lakes, all opposing the extension of this patent, all claiming that it would be an injurious monopoly; that the parties having the patent have already received during the existence of the patent very large sums of money, far larger than this report of the committee shows. The truth or the falsity of this statement I have no means of knowing; but I have received one remonstrance this morning which I desire to read:

To the honorable Senators and Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The owners of the steam grain-shovel patent (which was granted to Messrs. Milsom, Spendclow & Watson in the year 1865) have an application before your honorable body for an extension of their patent. Under this patent a royalty of fifty cents per thousand bushels has been collected, realizing to the owners handsome profits, being in amount at least $250,000 since 1873.

The undersigned, citizens of the United States, and owners of vessels navigating the Western lakes, respectfully protest against the continuance of the tax upon commerce which would result from an extension of this patent, and pray that your honorable body will not grant such extension.

This is signed by gentlemen with whom I am personally acquainted, one of them the owner of a large elevator at Port Huron and nearly all the others engaged in the transportation of grain from the Western ports to Eastern ports. I have, but not with me, several letters on the subject from the presidents of transportation companies and from other gentlemen engaged in the grain-shipping interest.

I had been led to believe before the report of the committee in this case that the use of this patent in the one port of Buffalo, which is the great grain-receiving port in transit, has been a tax and an unnecessary tax of thirty, forty, or fifty cents a thousand bushels upon all grain handled by the elevators where this machine was used; that by a combination between the shovelers and the owners of the elevators the price of handling grain at that port has been increased. I see that the committee's report corroborates that idea. Every one knows that any additional expense in the handling of grain between the West and the East falls as a tax upon the producer; that the price of grain in all the Eastern markets is regulated, if not by the Liverpool price, at least by the price at the shipping port of the United States, New York.

Mr. CALL. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CONGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. CALL. I ask the honorable Senator if he does not take the sworn statement of the actual rates paid since the expiration of the patent as conclusive evidence to show whether or not this invention is any tax on the public?

Mr. CONGER. If I read the report aright, the report admits that there has been an increase in the price of handling grain of at least fifty cents or a dollar within the last two or three years during the existence of this patent.

Mr. CALL. Oh, no, sir; it is since the expiration of the patent that the increase has been made.

Mr. CONGER. One portion of this patent did not expire until this month or the last, so that virtually the patent has continued up to the present time. Now, I assume that all additional expense of handling grain through these elevators by any combination of shovelers and elevator-men is an additional expense and tax upon the producers of grain throughout the West.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's time is up. Is there unanimous consent that the Senator shall continue for five minutes longer? ["Go on!"] The Chair hears no objection, and the Senator from Michigan will proceed.

Mr. CONGER. Prior to 1861 the law gave to an inventor fourteen years' use of his invention by a patent with the right to apply for an additional seven years' use of it. In 1861 Congress changed the law, limiting and confining the use of a patent to seventeen years. I have been led to believe that the law of 1861 making that change was one of the most beneficial acts which Congress ever passed in relation to patents, both for the patentee and for the public. Since that law has been in force, and within the last five or six years about the time that patents issued under the old law were about to expire, Congress was flooded with innumerable applications for the extension of patents of every name and nature and variety; reapers, mowers, patents on all the agricultural implements, sewing-machines—I cannot enumerate the number of applications for extensions of patents that flooded both Houses of Congress. If they had been granted then, there would have continued in this country a monopoly that would have cost the people of the United States millions of dollars unnecessarily, for when those patents expired the prices of all the articles for which the people of the United States had been excessively taxed fell to half in many cases. Half the prices which had been demanded the week before the patents expired were accepted after that. That is a fact within the knowledge of every observant man in the United States.

Congress, about the time that the patents under the old law expired, took hold of this subject of the extension of patents with careful examination and scrupulousness, and in every instance almost within my recollection—and I was at that time chairman of the Committee on Patents in the House—Congress refused to extend patents unless it appeared that the patentee had been deprived by sickness or by poverty or by some reason over which he had no control of the opportunity of receiving any benefits from his patent. This course on the part of Congress quieted that whole subject. The country came to understand that there were not to be any longer extensions of those old patents which had monopolized the business of the country, and had yielded rewards for the use of inventions to the extent of millions upon millions of dollars. This satisfied a feeling all over the West and the Northwest and the South that Congress did not intend to extend the right to the use of a patent beyond the time prescribed in that careful provision of law which made seventeen years the utmost limit of the exclusive use of a patent.

Sir, at that time there had come over the people of the United States such a feeling of opposition to a constitutional monopoly of these inventions and their use that there was, in my judgment, great danger of a majority of the people demanding the repeal of all patent-rights. The feeling of the whole community was aggravated by the enormous palaces built by the sewing-machine companies and by the reaping and mowing machine companies and the ten thousand extortions upon the farmers all over the country by the demand for payment for the use of patents of which they knew nothing.

I desire that inventors shall have under the Constitution the right to the exclusive use of their inventions for such time as the law shall prescribe. That is right; that is constitutional; that is reasonable. The people of the United States will not complain of it; but Congress, after ninety years of experience under the old law, revised the whole system, and declared that seventeen years was, in the judgment of Congress, (and it met the approval of the whole American people,) the proper limit for the exclusive use of an invention by a patentee. I think it would be dangerous to patentees themselves to tamper with that principle now embodied in the law.

The argument used in this case the other day was that this is necessary; that only one set of machines for one city has ever been built; that the shovelers were formerly liable to injury to their health from not having the use of such a patent. All this proves to me that the men who can manufacture an instrument of that kind, limited in use to a few ports, can always have the value of it in the market without any patent. Here is a cumbersome, intricate machine, a necessary machine, it is said, which has been seventeen years in operation, and yet it is used only in one place, because of the additional expense it entails on the transportation of grain. The owners of elevators and the shippers refuse to encourage the use of such a patent, so that at only one port in the United States, (although grain is received at many where such a machine might be used for millions and millions of bushels,) only at Buffalo, has this been demanded, and there only by a combination with elevator-owners, with shovel-men, with shippers. In that manner they have been enabled to put upon the produce of the Western and Southern States going to an Eastern market an additional tax of several cents a thousand bushels in addition to the ordinary tax on transportation.

For these reasons I oppose the extension of this patent, and do not think from the report itself that the case is brought at all within the equity or reason of special legislation in such cases.

Mr. LAPHAM. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there unanimous consent that the Senator from New York shall speak twice on this subject? The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. LAPHAM. I remind the Chair that I only suggested an objection to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri when on the floor before.

It is easy, Mr. President, to see how these most fabulous estimates which are now produced of the profits of this invention are presented here at this time. They are made by taking the whole amount of shipments of grain at Buffalo, and reckoning a royalty on it for the whole period of these patents. These are not the facts at all. The parties in New England, the parties at Baltimore, the parties who are represented here in this opposition—the vessel-owners at the West—have no more interest in this question than the Sultan of Turkey. They are not affected by it in any way whatever; and I beg to call the attention of the Senate for a few moments to information which I have direct from parties residing in Buffalo, owners of elevators and owners of vessels upon the lakes. The first I call attention to is the statement of D. S. Austin, the vice-president of the Western Elevating Company at Buffalo. He states that these patentees were persons in his employment for a great many years, and were in his employment at the time they made this invention; that they are hard-working, honest, and worthy men. He says he assisted them in their arrangements with the elevators in introducing the machine, and knows all about the troubles and discouragements they met with for years; and also knows that they have received but a very small amount altogether for the use of their invention.

He also says that the price paid for shoveling this year is precisely the same as it was last year when this royalty was paid. There is no different charge to the public since the royalty ceased from what it was before, because the price paid is controlled by the shovelers' union of that city, and always has been, and these inventors had to make terms with them to get the limited royalty which they received.

He refers also to the fact that when the project of extending this patent was first made known, the Legislature of the State of New York undertook to remonstrate, as the constituents of one of the Senators from Connecticut have undertaken to remonstrate. A resolution was introduced in the house of Assembly, but when they came to ascertain the facts in reference to it, that all fell through and there has been no further action taken upon the subject.

Mr. Austin states that he has conversed with Mr. Kelderhouse, one of the largest owners of shipping on Lake Erie, and he states that he has no objection whatever to the extension of this patent. I have here a letter from Mr. Kelderhouse himself, who says:

I am, and have been for many years, largely interested in steamers and vessels which carry grain on the lakes, and also have a controlling interest in two transfer elevators and am thoroughly acquainted with the manner of elevating and shoveling grain at this port, and know that the patent shoveling machine is not, nor never has been, a charge upon the public. If it was, or I thought it would be, I should consider it to my interest to oppose the extension.

He then goes on to say, as does Mr. Austin, that the price paid this year is precisely the same as it was last year, and that the cessation of the royalty creates no change whatever in the price paid.

I have also a letter here from Mr. C. J. Wells, who states:

I am the owner of two elevators, and have no interest in these patents, and the extension of them that is asked for will work no hardship here upon commerce. The royalty hitherto paid for the use of this shovel is an element simply in the general cost of shoveling, which is regulated by the shoveler's union, and has never increased that cost. In fact, without the use of this shovel the cost of shoveling grain here would be greater than it is now.

It has actually diminished the cost, because it diminishes the amount of labor required. He says:

No royalty is now being collected, for these patents have expired; but the price of shoveling is still precisely what it was last year, and neither grain nor vessel owners will be injured by this extension, and through it an act of justice will be done to these poor men who, without fault or neglect on their part, were compelled some years ago to dispose of their interest in the original term of their patents, as they state in their application now before Congress.

These, Mr. President, are the facts in the case. It is a mistake to suppose that the extension of these patents is to be any tax upon commerce. It is the reverse. It diminishes the power of the shovelers' union to make their own exactions as to price. It is a restraint upon them; and actually, as one of these gentlemen states, it has reduced the cost of shoveling the grain instead of increasing it.

The extension of these patents will work no tax whatever upon commerce either coming from the West or going to the East. It is simply the payment of a royalty out of the general cost of shoveling, from the fact that the shoveling is done with less hand labor and with more facility and dispatch. Strike out the use of these machines and the shoveling would cost a great deal more time and would work a great many delays. The use of these will be continued, it is true, without the passage of this bill; but the poor men who invented them and who have gone practically without compensation up to this time will be left without that remuneration which the policy of the law gives to every worthy inventor.

This is not a sewing-machine; this is not a reaping-machine; this is not an invention which goes into general use; it is an invention for local use only, imposing no tax upon the public, not increasing the cost to the public or the commerce of the country; and all these objections, in view of that state of facts, which are the real facts of the case, fall entirely to the ground.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, I fail to understand where the supporters of this bill find warrant for their statement that patents are granted for the purpose of securing compensation to inventors. Under the Constitution, the exclusive right to the use of a discovery or invention may be granted by Congress to a discoverer or inventor, for what purpose? As compensation for his time or for the labor that he has expended? For the purpose of enabling an assignee to accumulate money by the use of the invention? Certainly not. The avowed purpose of the Constitution in regard to this class of powers that are conceded to Congress is to promote progress in the useful arts and in science; and the advantage that may accrue to the inventor is merely incidental; it is no part of the original purpose or design of the Constitution in authorizing Congress to patent inventions or discoveries.

The Senator from New York and others who have advocated this measure for the extension of this patent assert that unquestionably protests can be obtained from great corporations engaged in handling and transporting grain, and that those who are interested as assignees will protest also in case Congress should not accede to their demands. The trouble is that one element is entirely left out in this discussion. It does not make a particle of difference to the elevator companies or to the transportation companies how much they have to pay for the royalty on this patent. So far as their interests are affected the patent might be indefinitely extended. The fact is that for every cent that the elevators pay or that transportation companies pay there is so much of a diminution upon the producers of the grain, the wheat and the corn, that is handled.

I do not object, Mr. President, to the exclusive use of a discovery by an inventor for a reasonable time. It is proper; there can be no reasonable objection to it; but I insist that if the exclusive monopoly of an invention for the period of seventeen years is not sufficient to requite the discoverer for the time and labor expended, then it is useless to anticipate that any further benefit can result to him by an extension.

I feel that the productive industries and resources of this country have been subjected to intolerable burdens by the administration of the patent laws. I am opposed on principle to the extension of all patents unless there are extraordinary reasons shown, which do not appear to exist in this case, and I therefore move that the pending bill be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. PLATT. I regret, Mr. President, to detain the Senate one moment longer upon this bill; it has already taken more time than I wished that it should; but I desire before the vote for an indefinite postponement is taken to try in a few words to recall the attention of the Senate to some of the principal features in the case.

These parties have had the use of this patent for less than seven years. They have not had the use of it for seventeen years practically.

Mr. INGALLS. Who has had the use of it for the remaining period?

Mr. PLATT. Nobody. From 1864, the time of the granting of this patent, to 1874 nobody used the patent; it was not introduced in use; and so the theory that a person is to have seventeen years out of his patent is not carried out in this case, and it was not the fault of the patentees.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Whose fault was it?

Mr. PLATT. It was the fault of people who resisted the introduction of it by force, trades unions, shovelers' unions, who, when the patentees attempted to introduce this, resisted to the extent of frightening everybody from putting it in operation. It seems to me that makes a case where the parties have in fact had only seven years' use of the patent. That is the first point.

The second is this: Is it to be a tax on the public? Now I am free to say that if, on the hearing of this case before the committee, the arguments that have been made and the consideration which we had given it, I had believed that even this small charge of fifty cents on the thousand bushels of grain would be a tax on the public, I would not have reported in favor of this bill; but I regard it entirely different from that. There has been no royalty paid since August, 1881, and the price of unloading and transporting to the cars has not changed in any respect. Just stop to think of it a moment and try to compute if you can how much it is on a bushel of wheat—fifty cents on a thousand bushels of wheat is to be paid to these inventors who have not, as I think, received a reasonable compensation, or it is to be retained by the transportation companies and elevator owners. It seems to me that is just the question. I do not believe the public are going to get the benefit of that fifty cents a thousand bushels if the patent is extended.

Mr. HOAR. One twentieth of a cent a bushel.

Mr. PLATT. It is one-twentieth of a cent on a bushel of grain. That is the statement of a gentleman who has made the computation. That is a very insignificant sum, and yet it amounts to considerable with parties who are handling immense quantities of grain; and I believe, from all the evidence in this case, that is to inure, not to the benefit of the public, but to the benefit of the transportation companies and the railroad companies in case we refuse to extend the patent. I agree that there is opposition here, and it comes from the transportation companies; and it is the easiest thing in the world for them to stir up boards of trade all over the country by peculiar representations in relation to this matter to put in objections and remonstrances here; but I believe that all there is in this objection is just this, whether the railroad companies and the transportation companies shall put this fifty cents a thousand bushels into their own pockets or whether it shall continue to be paid to the patentees.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to postpone indefinitely.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, I have but a word or two to say. The Senate will recollect the very famous case that was here for the extension of a patent in behalf of a poor, destitute, and needy widow woman. There was some doubt in the minds of a number of Senators as to the destitution and poverty and need of that woman, and as to the benefit that she would receive. I understood she was taken before the Committee on Patents and sworn as to what interest she would have in the extension of the patent, and it was developed that she was to get $20,000 for having the patent-right extended for the benefit of the assignee. Now, I say that with the facts in this case——

Mr. PLATT. What case does the Senator refer to?

Mr. COCKRELL. I cannot hunt up the case and give the name.

Mr. PLATT. Not this case?

Mr. COCKRELL. Oh, not this case. It was another case, something about a sewing-machine for shoes, I think.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. That patent was not extended.

Mr. COCKRELL. I know it was not extended, but appeals were made for its extension with as much zeal and earnestness as have been made for this, and practically on the same grounds.

Mr. HOAR. Did not the Committee on Patents report against that extension?

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not remember about that. I am not sure whether the committee reported against it or not.

Mr. HOAR. Will my friend allow me to ask him if he is seriously making the argument that when the Committee on Patents have carefully and thoroughly taken evidence of the facts, their finding is to be disregarded or whistled down in this way? Of course it may be disregarded, if the Senate think otherwise; but does it help us in deciding whether they are right or not to say that somebody once made a false and pretended claim through a widow?

Mr. COCKRELL. I am making no argument of that kind; the Senator can draw his own inference. I simply desire to say that patentees who come before Congress for an extension of their patent-rights always plead poverty and that they have made nothing out of their patent-rights. Then they plead again that the benefit of the extended patent will go to them individually, while ninety-nine cases out of a hundred it goes to an assignee. I say in this case I challenge the committee to bring forward these parties and give persons here a chance of cross-questioning them, and the fact will be developed that it will not go to their individual use. If the patent-right is extended it will go to the monopoly in Buffalo that has had the exclusive use of it heretofore.

Mr. PLATT. Will the Senator permit me? The committee did cross-examine the parties on that subject. It is sworn to under oath that it is for their benefit; for the benefit of no one else.

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes, their benefit. They will get some pay from these other fellows. The Senator may shrug his shoulders; that is the very point I am making. As a matter of course they will get something; they will get a thousand, two thousand, or ten thousand dollars perhaps; but I say this patent is not to go to them for their individual use. It is to go to this same corporation or combination that has had it before. Now they speak about this not raising the price of wheat. Let us see what the committee themselves say:

In 1880 the shovelers' union raised the price of shoveling from $3.50 per thousand bushels on sailing-vessels and $4 per thousand on steam-vessels to $4 and $4.50, respectively, its present price.

They say it has not increased it. The monopoly has been able to increase the price fifty cents a thousand bushels in the year 1880 and there it stands by the report of the committee.

Mr. CALL. Will the Senator allow me to correct him?

Mr. COCKRELL. No, I do not want any correction. Here is your own report that stands here in print. You can correct the report and not me.

Mr. CALL. Will you hear what I have to say?

Mr. COCKRELL. Here is the report. I want Senators when they make a report to stand to it and not come here and say that the report is not correct. Now I will read the report for the benefit of the Senator from Florida:

In 1880 the shovelers' union raised the price of shoveling from $3.50 per thousand bushels on sailing-vessels and $4 per thousand on steam-vessels to $4 and $4.50, respectively.

That is true. That is the point I am making.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will pardon me. The Senator said it was on account of this patent that it was done.

Mr. COCKRELL. Oh, it was on account of something else, I know.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. My honorable friend from Missouri, I am sure, would not seriously misstate anything.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am not misstating it; I am only reading the report.

Mr. HOAR. I beg his pardon. He will hear me. If he was aware that he was making a false impression, different from what he meant to say, he would be obliged to any Senator who would point it out to him. The Senator said just now, as I understood him, and as I think the Senate must have understood him, that on account of this invention this rise in the price had taken place. That is what he said. Then on a Senator rising to correct him, he reads from the report the fact that in a certain year the price was raised, but he does not read from the report any fact that it was raised in consequence of this shovel. Now his attention, therefore, is called to the difference between his statement and the statement in the report. He would not desire to let that stand, and simply shout and say he wanted men to stand by their own report, when his attention was called to that.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let me read from the report. I think the Senator from Massachusetts should study the report a little more closely. When I read from the report, the Senators attempt to correct the report every moment. I will read plain English:

In 1880 the shovelers' union raised the price of shoveling from $3.50 per thousand bushels on sailing vessels—

Who were the shovelers' union? The patentees——

Mr. PLATT and others. No, no.

Mr. HOAR. The shovelers' union is an association of men who work with hand-shovels. They fought the introduction of this invention years and years, and there was danger that, as did the English people who resisted labor-saving machinery, they might set fire to the buildings and elevators of persons who used it.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let me read from the petition.

Mr. HOAR. Finding that——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there unanimous consent that the Senator from Missouri shall proceed? ["No objection."]

Mr. HOAR. Then, finding that this invention was of great value to them, as it saved their lives——

Mr. VOORHEES. I do not know how matters are proceeding here. I intended to call for the regular order at two o'clock.

Mr. HOAR. Will not the Senator allow me to finish my sentence?

Mr. VOORHEES. Will the Senator from Massachusetts pardon me for making an inquiry? I understood the Presiding Officer to ask that unanimous consent be given to proceed with the consideration of this case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Oh, no; unanimous consent for the Senator from Missouri to have five minutes longer.

Mr. VOORHEES. Very well.

Mr. HOAR. Thereupon this shovelers' union, finding that this invention saved many of their lives from the dust and chaff which they had to encounter in the holds of these vessels, agreed to let it be used, and there was a small royalty paid to the inventors by the persons who purchased it of the inventors, and that is a very small part of the entire $4 a thousand, or whatever is the cost, and that was raised on a strike just as the wages of labor are raised.

The error of my friend from Missouri, if he made the error as I understand him to do, was in imputing to the Senator from Florida the statement that a rise which took place in consequence of a certain strike at the time wages were going up all over the country in other matters was due to this patent. It had nothing whatever to do with it. Now, if the Senator will find anything to the contrary of that in the report, I will confess my mistake. It would have gone a good deal higher, the Senator from New York says, if it had not been for the patent.

Mr. COCKRELL. I read from the petition:

And your petitioners further say, that although they were three of the original stockholders in the said shoveling company, they disposed of all their stock therein, as set forth in the said affidavits, and that though the said shoveling company has received a royalty from the elevators for the use of the said shovel—

Now they are all partners together with the elevator and grain companies.

Mr. HOAR. That is not the shovelers' union. The Senator is confounding two things.

Mr. COCKRELL. I was speaking of the shoveling company, and not the shovelers' union.

Mr. HOAR. But it is the shovelers' union that fixed that price of $4.50. The shovelers' union is an association of workingmen who shovel with hand-shovels.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have heard that a thousand times since this case has been up.

Mr. HOAR. Then why does my learned friend, when he speaks of the shoveler's union, speak of it as——

Mr. COCKRELL. Why does the Senator from Massachsetts every time I make a statement from the report or from the record attempt to explain it away?

Mr. HOAR. I do not.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am reading, and every time I read a sentence up bounces a Senator from this committee to offer to correct the report, to try to correct the affidavits of these men, to try to correct the petition of these men. I should like to know just one solitary thing upon which we can rely.

Mr. PLATT. Will the Senator allow me one moment?

Mr. COCKRELL. With pleasure.

Mr. PLATT. I know the Senator does not wish to mislead the Senate. I think he has misled himself. The only earthly interest I have in this discussion is that I do not like to be charged with saying a thing in a report and then running away from it. The Senator has evidently confused two bodies here, the shovelers' union, who are hand-shovelers, a kind of trade union, and the shoveling company, who manage this patent. There is where his confusion arises, and I know that he does not intend to make any misstatement.

It is said in this report that the shovelers' union—those are the laborers—raised the price; and if he will turn right over on the next page he will find that prior to making that demand they stopped work; and the whole business of lifting grain at Buffalo was suspended for several days, and that continued until the elevator companies acceded to the demands of the shovelers. The patent has not raised it; it was the hand-shovelers who by striking raised the price. I think the Senator will see that we do not change anything we said in the report.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let me read this; perhaps the Senator will want to explain this:

This price for shoveling in sail-vessels is divided as follows: $2 a thousand are paid to the shovelers, $1.50 a thousand to the elevators, and 50 cents a thousand to the steam-shovel, and for propellers and steamers, which pay $4.50 a thousand for shoveling, $2.25 a thousand are paid to the shovelers, $1.75 a thousand to the elevators, and 50 cents a thousand to the steam-shovel.

A regular partnership; $4.50 gross charges divided out in these proportions among these parties. If these gentlemen are so earnest in their statement that this is not a tax upon every bushel of wheat, corn, oats, rye, and barley produced in the West and North, let them say that this extension shall be confined to the city of Buffalo. If it does not increase the price anywhere, let them confine it to Buffalo, and let them and these shovelers' unions and this shoveling company and the elevator-men have the glory and the honor and the monopoly and the profits of it. If it is no burden to the people, let us except the people from it. No, sir; this is a monopoly, and it is one that is grinding upon every producer of corn and of wheat and of oats in this whole country. I trust that the bill will be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of two o'clock having arrived——

Mr. PLATT. Cannot we take a vote on the indefinite postponement of the bill?

Mr. VOORHEES. Regular order.

Mr. INGALLS. Regular order.

Mr. SHERMAN. Cannot we have a vote?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order is insisted on.

NAVIGABLE WATERS OF UPPER COLUMBIA.

Mr. ANTHONY. I wish to make a report; I was not present when reports were called for this morning. The Committee on Printing to which was referred a resolution for printing 10,000 copies of the report of Lieutenant T. W. Symons respecting the navigable waters of the Upper Columbia River, have instructed me to report it back with amendments and recommend its passage. I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, submitted by Mr. SLATER on the 2d instant:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House concurring,) That 10,000 copies of the report of Lieutenant T. W. Symons, Corps of Engineers, respecting the navigable waters of the Upper Columbia River and its tributaries, and resources of the country adjacent thereto, be printed, 1,000 for the use of the War Department, 3,000 for the use of the Senate, and 6,000 for the use of the House.

The Committee on Printing reported the resolution with amendments.

The first amendment was, to strike out "ten" and insert "five;" so as to read "that 5,000 copies of the report," &c.

Mr. ANTHONY. The amendments reduce the number one-half throughout.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, to strike out "1,000" and insert "500;" so as to read "500 for the use of the War Department," &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, to strike out "3,000" and insert "1,500;" so as to read "1,500 for the use of the Senate," &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, to strike out "six" and insert "three;" so as to read "3,000 for the use of the House."

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

MORDECAI AND COMPANY.

Mr. BAYARD. I have a bill for the relief of parties in Baltimore, reported unanimously from the Committee on Finance. It is Senate bill No. 1785. I think it can be passed without debate.

Mr. PLUMB. I will yield if it leads to no debate.

By unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 1785) for the relief of David Mordecai and J. Randolph Mordecai, composing the commercial firm of Mordecai & Co., of Baltimore, Maryland, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to David Mordecai and J. Randolph Mordecai, composing the commercial firm of Mordecai & Co., of Baltimore, Maryland, of $822, illegally collected from vessels owned by them by the collector of customs at Charleston, South Carolina.

Mr. BAYARD. The facts in this case are entirely sustained by a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. CALL submitted amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 6184) makings appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 5559) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

MILITARY LAND-WARRANT LOCATIONS.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill (S. No. 67) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to ascertain and certify the amount of land located with military warrants in the States described therein, and for other purposes.

Mr. GARLAND. Yesterday, when I moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business, it was my intention to take the floor to say something on this bill, and I may as well proceed to do so now.

The report of the committee and the argument made by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] yesterday were so full and complete and so satisfactory to me that I really do not know how I can say anything further to claim the support of the Senate for this bill, and I shall be very brief in stating just a few points in reference to it, because the subject is not a new one. A majority of the Senate, at least, have considered it once, and some of them twice heretofore since I have been a member of the Senate. It is a matter arising out of public law, to which the attention of the country has been repeatedly called. The reason of my own interest in it is that the State which I in part represent on this floor is one of the States with which one of these compacts was made in regard to the waiver of the right of taxation of the public lands, and one of the States which of course should receive the benefit of what is known as the 5 per cent.

To begin with, Mr. President, the question, so far as these eighteen States are concerned, in their relations with the United States, assumes the shape of an absolute contract based upon a proper consideration. That, I think, has been established beyond any question, both by the report made by the Senator from Kansas and by the speech he favored the Senate with yesterday.

In addition to that I beg leave to cite what Judge McLean said in reference to this matter in the celebrated case of the United States vs. The Railroad Bridge Company, in 1855, on the circuit, in which case a number of questions came up in regard to the power of the States and of the United States under the commercial clause of the Constitution over the navigation of the different rivers and in regard to the taxation of the public lands. In that case (6 McLean's Reports, page 531) Mr. Justice McLean said:

In the admission of New States into the Union compacts were entered into with the Federal Government that they would not tax the lands of the United States. This implies that the States had power to tax such land if unrestrained by compact.

I am reading this principally for the benefit of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] who I see is absent from his seat, who submitted yesterday to the Senator from Kansas that the States never had the power to tax the public lands within their limits. Judge McLean, in passing upon these compacts, says this implies that the States had the power "to tax such land if unrestrained by compact." It is not worth while to determine the question whether the States could have taxed these lands; but one thing is sure, a great many people believed at that time the States had the authority and power to tax the public lands, so that not to encumber these lands of the General Government, the public domain, as it is called briefly, with any doubtful right of the States, so as, in other words, to remove the claim entirely, these compacts with the States upon their admission were entered into. Then, as a principle of law, if the United States secured by these compacts what was at best a doubtful right before, there is a consideration at the bottom of this matter, a valid and a good consideration, as we term it in law, not a mere matter of moral consideration or a mere matter of equity. No one can controvert it, that if A compromises what he considers a doubtful right and afterward it turns out that there was no doubt about it, that his right was secure but he did not know it, he is held to have agreed on a valid consideration to the compromise he entered into to secure what he considered at that time to be a doubtful right. This question was also considered by the late Judge Curtis, and he gave an elaborate opinion, to be found in the first volume of his life and writings, page 423:

This claim grows out of the sixth section of the act of April 18, 1818, for the admission of that State—to the Union on an equal footing with the original States. That section is as follows:

"That 5 per cent. of the net proceeds," &c.

The point that bears upon the matter I am now discussing is on page 424:

It must be borne in mind that the agreement of the United States to disburse 2 per cent. of receipts from the sales of public lands within the State of Illinois "in making roads leading to the State," had a sufficient and corresponding consideration in the stipulation of the State not to tax the public lands in the hands of purchasers or patentees until after the lapse of certain fixed periods, that this agreement to reserve 2 per cent. of the sales of public lands and expend what was thus reserved in the public works described had all the elements of a contract; that it created a trust when the designated moneys were received.

Then he proceeds to apply that to the particular case in hand.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Will the Senator allow me right there to ask whether the waiver of the right to tax was not on the lands for a certain specified time after they were sold by the United States, and not merely while they were public lands held by the Government of the United States?

Mr. GARLAND. I think that was not the view of Judge Curtis, because he was referring to the particular case in hand, which was the waiver for a consideration of the right to tax the public lands. I will show after a little while how this thing has progressed in reference to the taxing of public lands, and how the question has come before the courts to determine sometimes what are public lands and what are not public lands.

We have as a starting point, speaking of the general principle of the bill, then of this consideration at the bottom. In the opinion of Judge McLean, from whose decision there was no appeal, although he decided several other very important matters in the case, and in the opinion of Judge Curtis, we have that consideration; it was a release of the power of taxing these lands by the States.

The question comes then directly, which has been suggested repeatedly here, what is a sale of these lands, or, in other words, are lands taken up with military bounty warrants lands sold within the meaning of the term "sale?" I think they are so for two reasons. First, when you come to consider what is the consideration of any political proceeding, or any matter that grows out of a particular right or a particular question, you must first go back to that particular right or question to ascertain the true foundation of it. Here we have established that there was a contract not to tax these lands, or, more properly speaking, there was a valid and good consideration in law for the surrender of that right.

It is true that when the lands were taken up by military bounty warrants no money went into the Treasury of the United States, and yet the Government had from the soldier, to whom each warrant was issued, its valid consideration for the issuing of that military bounty warrant; and it is a mistake to suppose that these military bounty warrants were issued as a mere gratuity or as a matter based upon merely a moral contract. Now I will read, if the Senate will bear with me, from Cooley on Taxation, page 74:

Some taxes levied by the Federal Government are directly calculated and intended to benefit private individuals. For an illustration, it gives bounty land or pensions to those who have performed military or naval services for the country, notwithstanding it has made no promise, and is consequently under neither a legal nor a moral obligation to do so. But the primary object in all such bounties is not the private but the public interest. To show gratitude for meritorious public services in the Army and Navy by liberal provision for those who have performed them is not only proper in itself, but it may reasonably be expected to have a powerful influence in inciting others to self-denying, faithful, and courageous services in the future, when the Government, which is so ready to be generous as well as just, shall have need of their assistance.

And, as said by Mr. Corwin, who is quoted in the report of the committee, there can be no more valid consideration at the bottom of any proceeding or any contract than the services, and the muscle, and the blood, if you please, of the soldier who performed these services for the country. So the consideration here is not one of a mere gratuity; it is not one of mere benevolence; but it stands upon a consideration of services rendered by the soldier, and a valid consideration, for which all the States are taxed, though but one of the States might have soldiers within its limits receiving the benefits of that law.

But further than that, for another reason an executed bounty is as valid a contract as if there had been a valuable consideration in law paid for it. All these gratuities, so called, by the Government, the swamp-land grants, and all things else of that character, are beyond the power of the Government to revoke after they have become executed or after they have been put in process of execution by the parties who relied on them. That is so not only in this country but in every country recognizing the common law. No donation, no gift, no pure matter of gift, can be revoked for any cause after it has become executed. There was a principle in the civil law to the reverse of that, but it has never obtained in the countries that recognize the common law and practice on it; and it has never had a footing in this country.

So, then, there we have the consideration to the soldier for his military bounty warrant which runs back to the contract made in the compacts with these States upon their admission that the public lands should not be taxed. The question has very often come up before the courts, and this is somewhat responsive to the suggestion made to me by the Senator from Delaware a few moments ago, as to what are public lands within the meaning of this power to tax by the States under these compacts made with them upon their admission. In the work entitled The Public Domain, issued the year before last, where the authorities on this subject are collected up to that time, chapter 15, page 238, under the head of "Two, three, and five per cent. funds; grants to States of portion of net proceeds from sales," we find the different States from Alabama on, the various grants, their dates, &c., what each State should receive; and then:

TAXATION OF PUBLIC LANDS.

Under the present practice, after the register's certificate and receiver's receipt have been issued for lands purchased of or acquired from the United States, the authorities of the States or Territories in which they lie list them for taxation although no patent has issued. Prior to this only the value of improvements is taxed, not the land, as the fee is in the United States. States containing public lands renounce their right to tax the public domain at the time of their admission into the Union.

That is just what this bill is predicated upon.

A State may tax land after it has been entered and paid for, although no patent has been entered (issued) therefor. (Carroll vs. Safford, 3 How., 441; Levi vs. Thompson, 4 How., 17; Carroll vs. Perry, 4 McLean, 25; Astrom vs. Hammond, 3 McLean, 107; Witherspoon vs. Duncan, 4 Wall., 210; S. C., 21 Ark., 240.)

The only question that bothered the courts upon this is whether these lands were taxable at any time before the patent issued. The courts have held that when the lands have been sold and paid for and a certificate of purchase or a certificate of entry has been issued, the fee then is gone out of the United States, although the patent has not been issued, and they are taxable, because otherwise a man might rely upon his certificate of entry and escape paying the tax and might never take out the patent. That, in a nutshell, is the doctrine lying at the foundation of this bill; first, that these States relinquished this right supposed to exist in them of taxing these lands, and they were to have 5 per cent. of the net proceeds of the sales in consideration thereof. When the land has been paid for in money or otherwise, whether in flesh and blood or the service of the soldier, or what not, it is a sale. By the report of the committee it appears that the different States, commencing with the States of Ohio and Indiana, "stipulate that the public lands therein shall remain exempt from all tax whatever for the term of five years from date of sale." Iowa stipulated four things:

First. That she will not interfere with the primary disposal of the soil.
Second. Nor tax for any purpose the public lands.
Third. That the non-resident proprietors shall not be taxed more than the resident.
Fourth. That lands granted for military services in the war of 1812 that may be located therein shall not be taxed for three years from date of patent.

So the report goes on through the list of the eighteen States which relinquished this right, more or less, on different conditions, as stated. This has become a recognized principle in the Government in reference to these States. It is a contract that has been in process of execution, and it is too late at this time, in my judgment, for gentlemen to contest it; too late for gentlemen to say that it looks to them as a mere gratuity. It may seem to some to be a gratuity, but when these acts of admission were passed and these contracts were entered into, it was believed that the States were surrendering a right that might be valuable to them and might be probably troublesome to the General Government.

I have deemed it my duty to say thus much on the general principle of the bill. The amendment of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] is not now before the Senate, as I understand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. PLATT in the chair.) The Chair is advised that the question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. MORGAN,] which will be read.

Mr. MORGAN. I have not offered the amendment; I only submitted it to be printed for information. I supposed the amendment of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] was pending.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Alabama is not offered, the Chair understands. Then the question will be on the amendment of the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. SAULSBURY,] which will be read.

The ACTING SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert, as an additional section:

SEC. —. That no part of the money paid under this act to any of the States mentioned therein shall be applied by such States to the payment of agents or attorneys for services rendered by them in procuring the passage of this act, or in connection with the claims of such State to the money hereby authorized to be paid; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to withhold payment to any State until satisfactory assurances shall be filed with him, by the authorities of such State, that no part of the money paid under this act shall be so applied.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I deem it proper to say that my reason for offering the amendment is that I have understood these claims have been placed, or at least some of them, in the hands of agents, who are to receive contingent fees for collecting the claims, giving them a certain percentage of the amount which may be recovered. Arrangements were made some years ago with some of the States interested in the passage of this bill by which a very large percentage of the money appropriated by this bill should go into the hands of agents or attorneys employed to secure the passage of an act of this character. I do not know that such arrangements have been made, but I have been informed by authority that I believe creditable at least, that such is the fact, and I do not want to see anything in connection with this bill like what was true in regard to the arrears of pensions act. That it was said was worked up by agents, and the Congress of the United States was induced to pass that bill because of the interest agents had in the matter.

If the States choose to employ agents or attorneys to procure this legislation, they can pay for those services by the action of their Legislatures, but I have understood that when there was scarcely an idea that it was possible to secure legislation of this character very improvident arrangements were made, in one State at least, as I have understood, so far as to give one-third of all that should be recovered to the agent who should procure the legislation under which the money should be paid. It is to prevent the money which we are to vote out of the public Treasury going in that direction that I have seen proper to offer this amendment. It can do no harm, because if there have been agents employed by the States the States are able to pay them; but do not let us appropriate the money which by this bill will be given to the States, if it shall pass, in such way.

Mr. VOORHEES. A single word upon this amendment. It is to be presumed that the States who are interested in this matter are capable of protecting themselves in contracts which they may have made with persons to look after their interests. I do not know how it is with other States, nor do I care what arrangements they may have made for the purpose of securing their rights; but in my own State I understand the attorney-general, charged by the law of the State to look after the interests of the State, has employed persons to investigate, bring forward, and secure the establishment of the claim, as laudable, as proper, and as honorable a business as anybody was ever employed in for a State; and whether the State of Indiana sees fit to pay for that service out of the small amount that is coming to her, less than $100,000, by this bill is not a matter of any importance so far as her financial condition is concerned, whether she sees fit to pay for the services rendered her out of this money or by an act of her Legislature, and I presume it is not a matter of much concern to any Senator on this floor.

I say to the Senators here that it is not the amount of money involved in this bill for which I care so far as my State is concerned, but I understand and I know that in the act by which Indiana was admitted to this Union it was agreed that if she observed certain conditions on her part the Federal Government would observe certain conditions on hers; Indiana has observed those conditions and the Federal Government has not; and if in attempting to enforce her rights she has obligated herself, through her attorney-general, legitimately, openly, and fairly, it is her business to settle.

So, while I have the utmost appreciation of the vigilance of the Senator from Delaware in regard to the public interests, I must be permitted to say that the State of Indiana is capable, without his guardianship, of looking to her own interests and guarding her own rights; and saying that for her, I say it as much for every other State

I know that certain State interests have to be looked after here. I am free and frank to say that a State agency ought to be established on the part of every State in this Union here at this capital to relieve members of Congress and Senators from the drudgery required at their hands before the Departments and elsewhere, in working for and placing the interests of their States and their people properly before the authorities here. I have no doubt that in the years that have gone by other States besides Indiana have had agents employed here. As to their payment, whether it comes out of this money or shall be made by an act of Legislature hereafter, that is a matter of no concern to me, and the only reason why I rise to resist the amendment is that it is an imputation upon these States that they are not capable of taking care of their own affairs, and need the vigilance and guardianship of Congress, which, so far as the State I represent is concerned, she does not require.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I had no intention of assuming the guardianship of Indiana or of any other State in this Union, nor can this amendment be properly construed as any attempt on the part of its mover or of the Senate, if it should adopt it, of supervising or controlling in any way the action of the State of Indiana.

I stated that I had been informed that years ago, when there was but very little expectation or hope on the part of the States themselves that a proposition of this kind would receive the least consideration in the Senate, very improvident agreements were made with special agents to come to Washington and try to procure such action on the part of the Government, whether through the Executive Departments or through the legislative department it made no difference, as would secure the money now claimed under this bill to the States, and that in one State (and that State, too, I am told, is to receive the largest portion of this money) an agreement was made to give to a certain gentleman in that State one-third of the whole amount, provided he could obtain such action on the part of the Government as would secure the donation to his State, and under this arrangement, if the bill passes, I am informed that gentleman will get $250,000 of money which is to be taken out of the public Treasury and donated to the State that he represents. Whether that is true or not I do not know. I am acting upon such information as I believe to be correct; and seeing that, and being informed that such arrangements had been made, I thought it was eminently proper, if by the passage of this bill Congress donated the money to the States that it should give it to the States and not vote it indirectly to agents to be put into their individual pockets.

I do not propose to claim the right to be the guardian of the State of Indiana or of any other State, but I do claim that I have a right as a Senator here when a bill is before the Congress of the United States proposing to take money out of the public Treasury to use whatever influence I may have by my vote or otherwise to prevent that money from being diverted from the public to whom it may belong and being placed in the hands of private individuals who have made contracts to procure such action by the Government as may secure the payment of the money involved in the bill. That was the object I had in offering the amendment.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President, while the General Government stipulated in these various acts of admission substantially what the respective States should do with the 5 per cent. of the sales of public lands, it has never assumed to exercise any special control over that disposition. It has intrusted that matter to the States; and I think it is pretty late now, after all this time has elapsed and after all this larger expenditure has been made and has gone into the hands of the respective States and no question ever has been raised as to the manner in which it has been expended, as we approach the doing of this act of tardy justice, that we should embarrass it by an amendment which seems to imply that the States cannot be trusted to make the proper disposition of this money.

Upon the general question of agents, I may say that so far as I know absolutely or have any reason to suspect, there is nothing in the statement made by the Senator from Delaware. I may be mistaken, but as far as I know there is nothing in it at all. At the same time I have not any doubt there are agents here of the respective States. I know, for instance, that there is an agent here for the State of Illinois in regard to some swamp-land claim. I know one has been here also from one or two other States. Kansas has had an agent here for the purpose of settling its war claims with the General Government. I may say that out of the multitude of claims of that kind and of the other kinds that have been settled during the last fifteen years or the last fifty years, as the case may be, they would not have been settled if the State had not appointed some one to come here and stay "in season and out of season" and press upon the General Government the obligation which it was under to the States for the payment of the money.

I can say further that it seems to me the General Government is not in a position to object to the employment of agents. The General Government does not do justice spontaneously. It requires to be reminded of its obligations. It settled the claim of the States of New Jersey, Pennsylvania, New York, Ohio, and all of the Northern States for moneys which they spent at a time when the Government needed to have the money spent, and when it did not have the money itself or was not in a condition to spend it. Those States have had agents here from time to time for the purpose of getting an adjustment of those accounts, and they have been adjusted with them in a manner satisfactory to the States and to the General Government. I undertake to say, as I said before, that if it had not been for the agencies employed by the States to remind the General Government of its obligation the adjustment would not have been made. Yet there never has been a suggestion that I have heard that a single one of all these adjustments was not upon a just and fair basis, just and fair to the General Government as well as to the States.

As I said, this simply comes back to the proposition that now, on the threshold of doing this act of tardy justice, we shall assume what has never before been assumed, that the States will not make that application of this money which by the terms of the several acts of admission they were required to make. That is all there is of it.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I do not know that I understood the Senator from Delaware correctly; but if I did, the remarks he made apply largely to the State which I in part represent here, because I believe the State of Iowa, by the computations which have been made, has the largest interest in this fund.

I know nothing with reference to the arrangements made with an agent of our State, although I believe our State has had an agent here for some time with reference to this and other claims to which we suppose the State is entitled.

I want to say to the Senator with reference to this fund that not one dollar of it can be paid to any one without an act of the Legislature of the State of Iowa, which, in my judgment, is as able to take care of itself as is the Senator from Delaware; at least I am willing to risk this question with the Legislature. Our constitution and our laws provide that all the money received from the 5 per cent. fund shall go directly into the school fund of our State, and that not one dollar of the principal of that fund shall be used, but the interest only shall be used forever for educational purposes. If an agent for the State of Iowa is here representing that State, he must look to the Legislature of the State for an appropriation to pay him for the services he renders here. No diversion of that fund can be made except by the action of the Legislature of Iowa. I do not know what the fact is, but I presume at some time such a State agent will be paid, as other State agents have been paid, for his reasonable services. What the compensation is or will be I do not know.

So far as I am concerned, I would have no special objection to this provision except that in my judgment it may do great injustice to the men who have interested themselves in matters pending before the Departments and before the Congress of the United States with regard to this fund; but I want to repeat what I said before, that this money, so far as Iowa is concerned, when the account is adjusted and accounted for as other moneys are adjusted and accounted for in the Treasury Department, must go, every dollar of it, into the treasury of the State of Iowa, and not one dollar can be diverted to any other purpose than that specified.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I do not know that the amendment of my colleague will reach the end that he desires, but I do wish there could be some legislative declaration, not by the Senate alone but by both Houses, to the effect that such influence as is supposed to promote the passage of measures in the two bodies cannot constitute a good and valid consideration for a contract. Over and over again the courts of this country in the States, and I believe the Supreme Court of the United States, have announced that it is not a good consideration for a contract that a man should have influenced political action.

It is greatly to be regretted that the class of individuals who come to the city of Washington and are called counsel or agents, or I know not what, but who do make their living by influencing legislation, should be assisted by the action of Congress. I do not mean to imply that there is anything unlawful, improper, or undesirable in persons having the intelligent supervision of cases before Congress; perhaps many times it may be essential for the purpose of obtaining testimony which members of Congress would not look up themselves. I do not doubt that that can be done as honorably as any other branch of human agency; but I do say that to influence and procure the passage of a bill through Congress ought not to be a valid consideration for a contract, and that when it is admitted that such a thing can be done and a man sue for it as for a valid service, either upon what we term a quantum meruit or upon an express agreement, we then admit a very dangerous doctrine.

If the amendment of my colleague could reach that evil, I should vote for it, but I do not think that the amendment can be effective. The money to be paid under this bill, if it passes, will be paid to the States and the representatives of the States. Congress will not pay it to transferees, Congress will not pay it to assignees; it must be paid to each State concerned, and when the State gets it it is responsible for the disposition it shall make of it to its own people.

The object of these land grants was the educational benefit of the people of the several States. They disposed of their interests under the original act as they saw fit, sometimes profitably and carefully, sometimes most unprofitably and carelessly; but whether we are to pay this 5 per cent. or not it still will be for the alleged benefit of a State and not to any private benefit. After the money has been paid the State, I cannot see how Congress can control the disposition of the money by the State, nor that it makes any difference to Congress whether the State shall pay fees in money to its counsel from its treasury drawn from other funds, or whether it shall keep its books so that the money paid to its agents shall be taken from this special fund.

I am disposed, for the reason I have stated, not to recognize this brokerage in Government influence, and not to admit that it forms a valid consideration to influence the action of Congress, or to influence the action of any department of the Government. I do not believe that that is a just basis for any contract; I do not believe that any court of justice would maintain it. I think Congress ought to do what it can to make the people of the United States believe that men in Congress do not vote under the influence of agents of any kind; and that a man with a fair claim can come to Congress with just as full assurance that honesty and justice will be meted out to him by his Government, whether he has no counsel at all or whether he has half the bar of America at his back.

I have seen enough practically in the Senate during my experience, not now a short one, to let me know that those claims are best attended to and most favorably considered in Congress which are not backed by a parcel of importunate lobby agents. Every day we see pains, care, thought, and labor bestowed by gentlemen in committee upon interests of individuals, of States, and of associations, simply because it is their public duty so to bestow them. There is no reason on God's earth why a man with an honest claim against the Treasury of the United States need employ counsel to come before Congress to prosecute it. If he has not time, if his private affairs will not allow his presence here, I do not say that he may not send a reputable and intelligent man to come to look after his case, and that that man is not entitled to a respectful hearing before any committee. Every day I see in the committees upon which I am placed men of intelligence and of high personal character come in there as the representative of claims, presenting claims and arguing them, submitting them, oftentimes in print, with ability and clearness and with great favor to myself and my associates who are simply seeking to be instructed fairly in the line of our duty. While this may be so, I think it is well to give a check to the idea that fair play requires to be bored in some way from the Congress of the United States.

I do not believe that a contract for such influence is good in law; I do not think any court of law would sustain a contract for such services. For my own part, I should be glad to vote in some way to signify that as a legislator I do not recognize such proposed or suggested influence as a valid consideration for a contract. But in this case suppose the money is paid as it must be if paid at all—and I do not think it will be by my vote—to the State or the representative of the State, after it is so paid what have we to do with it or how can we control the disposition the State may make of it?

While I think my colleague's amendment was intended in the right direction and was meant to save the States from improvident and unjust bargains, still the rectification of those bargains must be public opinion or a resort to the courts of law by a citizen of the State who finds the public treasury depleted by a bargain that ought not to have been entered into. If a contract was made with a State government that an attorney at law or any other person should receive 33 per cent. of this fund provided he could get a bill through Congress to grant it to the State, I believe that any citizen filing a bill in equity could restrain the payment of the money, and enjoin the governor against it. Therefore the remedy would be there; the contract would be void upon the ground of public policy, that it is impolitic that the public power and the public money of a government should be made the subject of private contract. I believe the remedy would be (and I believe the remedy would exist and would be effectually applied) to impeach the transaction upon the ground that it was against public policy, and therefore void to agree to procure the passage of a bill through a State or through the National Legislature.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President——

Mr. ALLISON. Before the Senator from Delaware proceeds, will he pardon me while I read a clause from the constitution of the State of Iowa?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALLISON. The constitution of the State of Iowa, in a section relating to school funds and school lands, provides that—

> The proceeds of all lands that have been, or hereafter may be, granted by the United States to this State for the support of schools which shall hereafter be sold or disposed of, and the 500,000 acres of land granted to the new States, under an act of Congress, distributing the proceeds of the public lands among the several States of the Union, approved in the year of our Lord 1841, and all estates of deceased persons who may have died without leaving a will or heir, and also such per cent. as may have been granted by Congress on the sale of lands in this State, shall be and remain a perpetual fund, the interest of which, together with all the rents of the unsold lands, and such other means as the General Assembly may provide, shall be inviolably appropriated to the support of common schools throughout the State.

That is the language of our constitution, and I read it to the Senator from Delaware merely to show how impossible it is for any such condition of things to exist with reference to the State of Iowa.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I listened to the reading of the provision of the constitution of Iowa, but I do not think the term "the proceeds of all lands" in that constitution would apply to this particular fund. However, that is not what I rose to say.

I do not know that my amendment will accomplish what I propose, and yet I think if my colleague had noticed the latter clause of the amendment he might have come to the conclusion that this money would necessarily have to go into the treasury of the States. My amendment provides—

> That no part of the money paid under this act to any of the States mentioned therein shall be applied by such States to the payment of agents or attorneys for services rendered by them in procuring the passage of this act, or in connection with the claims of such States to the money hereby authorized to be paid; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to withhold payment to any State until satisfactory assurances shall be filed with him, by the authorities of such State, that no part of the money paid under this act shall be so applied.

I framed it with a view of trying to prevent the application of this particular fund to the payment of the agents, whoever they may be, who are interested in the payment of this money by the Government. It may not be sufficiently binding and strong to prevent the diversion of this particular money of the State to the agents themselves; but even admitting that the State cannot apply this money, as the Senator from Iowa says, under the constitution to the payment of its agents, still there was a good reason for introducing the amendment and making an attempt to prevent any of it from going to the hands of lobbyists, agents, or anybody else except the States themselves.

We know that it has become a common proverb throughout the country that attempts are made to influence the action of the two Houses of Congress by what is known as the lobby, by men interested in procuring legislation, and I think it is due to the Senate of the United States and to both Houses of Congress that they should manifest in their legislation a determination not to have the money which they vote out of the public Treasury appropriated in any way by which it may reach the pockets of the men who are surrounding us constantly and filling these corridors for the purpose of trying to influence our action, and giving out to the world that they are having their influence upon the action of individual Senators and upon the action of both Houses of Congress.

If nothing else is to be accomplished by adopting the amendment, it will be an expression on the part of the Senate that it is their desire at least that the money which they vote under this bill to the different States of the Union shall not go into the hands and the pockets of attorneys, agents, lobbyists, or anybody else, but shall go into the treasuries of the various States. I say I do not know that it will accomplish that purpose, but it was the best I could devise to accomplish the purpose I had in view.

I have not acted without some reason for my action in this case, for I have shown to my colleague a letter from a high and respectable source, which I do not feel at liberty to make public, because I was not so authorized by the writer of it, who is a gentleman whom I know, whose character is equal to that of any man upon this floor. In his letter he stated that his information was that a contract had been made heretofore by which an agent of the State in which he lives was to receive one-third of the money which would come to that State under the provisions of this bill, and he suggested to me to try to remedy that matter by an amendment to the bill whenever it should come up. I have simply acted in obedience to the wish of a high and intelligent citizen of one of the States to be benefited in order that that State might not, by an improvident contract made heretofore, lose one-third of the benefit which it otherwise would derive under the bill. I have not felt at liberty to exhibit the letter I have received, because I am not authorized to do so. I have shown it to my colleague so that I might satisfy him that I was acting at the suggestion of parties who possibly would be interested in this fund.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, the amendment now pending I think is disrespectful to the States and ought not to be adopted. If the Senator wants to prevent the employment of lobbyists to prosecute and defend claims before Congress he ought to do it by some general bill, but it is very discourteous to the States to attempt to regulate their mode of conducting their business or to reproach them for employing agents to urge a claim which you now acknowledge to be just by passing this bill.

The States will keep their contracts, no doubt, if they have made any. I have no idea that any contracts such as have been stated were made with any of these States. I have no doubt that gentlemen have been employed by the proper authorities of some of these States to look up and state the amount involved in what is called the 5 per cent. fund. So far as I know, the State of Ohio has now no agent of that kind. I should think it would be very proper that a State should take proper means to ascertain the amount of public lands that have been given away under land-warrants in order to show what is due to the State from the General Government. Every one of the States has employed agents to look up their war claims. The State of Ohio had a gentleman here for years to look after such claims, and I suppose every loyal State of the Union had some one here to look after her interests in that matter. It was not at all improper; indeed, I can see no objection to it.

In respect to this particular claim, I desire to again express the opinion I did some years ago when a similar measure was pending in the Senate. It is assumed that Senators from the Western States embracing public lands will vote for this bill because their States are interested. The State of Ohio is interested in defeating this bill, although it would receive nominally $113,000 by the passage of it. The table introduced by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr.

BLAIR] and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] shows that Ohio will receive about $113,000 out of the $3,900,000 involved; but as the money to be paid on these claims is the common money of all the people of the United States, and as the proportion which the State of Ohio contributes to the general revenue is one-sixteenth of the whole amount, it follows that if the bill passes Ohio will pay about $260,000, while it would receive but $113,000. It is therefore clear that Ohio is interested against the passage of the bill.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Will the Senator allow me to make an inquiry? Was not the calculation as to the share that Ohio will get of the fund based upon the idea that the lands located with Virginia military land-warrants would be excluded from the operation of the bill?

Mr. SHERMAN. No; the only money that the State of Ohio will receive under the bill is the 5 per cent. on the Virginia military land scrip. We have already got our 5 per cent. on all the rest. The United States military land-warrant system was not in vogue to any considerable extent until after the public land was exhausted in Ohio. There were comparatively few United States land-warrants located in Ohio; I mean land-warrants issued by the United States after the war of 1812. Our public lands were mostly disposed of by reservations to States and by large sales to colonies or companies formed in the old States and by Virginia military land-warrants.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Let me ask the Senator whether there was not a particular stipulation in the cession by Virginia of Ohio military land-warrants, and a reservation made of certain lands of the State of Ohio for the purpose of meeting those Virginia military land-warrants?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will state that matter.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Then I want to follow that by another question. I wish to ask the Senator whether he believes it is right under such a reservation made by the State of Virginia in the cession of that land that Ohio should now come in and be paid 5 per cent. upon the value of that land?

Mr. SHERMAN. If my friend has any more questions to put I wish he would put them all at once, so that I may answer them in due order. In respect to the Virginia military land district, there was a stipulation, not made with Ohio at all, but before Ohio existed, between the State of Virginia and the United States before the adoption of the Constitution that a certain portion of what is now the State of Ohio should be reserved for the location of land scrip issued by the State of Virginia to her revolutionary soldiers. This scrip might be located in Ohio on the beautiful tract of land between the Big and Little Miami Rivers. In consideration of that reservation, or rather by an amicable adjustment of the grave dispute between the old States as to the disposition of the public lands, Virginia ceded to the United States her interest or claims, for it was a very shadowy claim, to the Northwestern Territory, reserving, however, the right of the holders of her land scrip to locate their lands in the Virginia military district of Ohio. This was done before and after Ohio was admitted as a State.

The State of Connecticut also made claim to a portion of the land in Ohio at the same time, and to satisfy this claim the then Congress of the Confederation agreed that Connecticut should have all the lands lying north of the forty-first parallel of latitude and running one hundred and twenty miles west, embracing over 3,000,000 acres of extremely valuable land. This land was sold by that State and is the basis of the school fund of Connecticut to this day.

The State of Massachusetts, as well as most of the States, claimed that this disposition of the western lands was not either just or fair. To meet these contesting claims the old Congress of the Confederation encouraged the purchase by companies from different States of large bodies of land in Ohio, then the only region open to settlement. Several of the States organized these companies, and in this way the serious conflict of opinion as to the proper disposition of the public lands was harmonized before the Constitution was adopted. The Ohio Company, organized in Massachusetts, and composed of many of her leading citizens, purchased at a low rate a large extent of territory at the mouth of the Muskingum River, and General Putnam, a descendant of old Rufus Putnam of the Revolution, was the leader of the colony and took the first settlement to Ohio.

Mr. HOAR. He was not a descendant of Israel.

Mr. SHERMAN. He was, I think, a son of old Israel Putnam, but I am not sure that I state his genealogy aright; I know he was the leader of the colony.

Mr. HOAR. General Rufus Putnam was from within ten miles of where I live, the town of Rutland, Massachusetts. He was himself a very able and distinguished revolutionary officer. He was a second or third cousin, a distant relative, of Israel Putnam, not a son but of altogether a different family. He was himself a revolutionary officer whose service commanded the approbation of Washington, I think more than once.

Mr. SHERMAN. General Rufus Putnam and a large body of Massachusetts people came out and made the first settlement in Ohio at Marietta, which still has the distinctive marks of its origin. Many of the leading families of the State of Massachusetts are represented in that settlement now.

New Jersey, not to be behindhand in this settlement of public lands, either before or soon after the framing of the Constitution, organized a company with a view to purchase lands in Ohio, and John Cleves Symmes, who was at that time I think a member of Congress from New Jersey, at least he was a very distinguished man, and his associates obtained a grant from Congress of a large quantity of land, including most of the beautiful Miami Valley and where Cincinnati now is. This settlement was made up mainly by Jersey people.

The people of Pennsylvania settled upon that portion of the public land immediately west of Pennsylvania. Other portions of the State of Ohio were given to refugees from Canada, so that a large part of the whole surface of Ohio was either reserved by old States or sold in large tracts to companies or colonies from the old States before the State of Ohio was born. Consequently the early settlers of Ohio never received any percentage for schools or roads from the proceeds of these lands, but all of it was reserved to or parceled out among the old States or their distinctive colonies. In one case the public lands became the basis of the school fund of Connecticut; in another case they were the means of paying Virginia land scrip issued to the soldiers of the Virginia line, a debt which the Congress of the Confederation had assumed but was unable to pay.

The absorption of so much of the public lands by Virginia and Connecticut led to the sales of large bodies to companies from other States at a nominal price. But all these sales and reservations enabled the United States to clear away the claims made by the several States, and to get a clean and undisputed title to the Western territory. At this time the present system of land title and subdivision was not formed and the great value of the Western lands was unknown. In this way a large portion of the land in Ohio was disposed of before the State of Ohio was formed, and then the balance of it, still a wilderness, was offered at the extravagant price of $2 an acre.

The people of Ohio in the olden time always complained that the Government of the United States had been unjust to them, more so than to the younger States formed out of the Western territory. The land was in great part held in large tracts and did not come under the beneficent policy afterward adopted by Congress, of subdivision into sections and quarter sections with reservations for schools which enabled families to settle and aid each other. The Connecticut land was sold under one system of subdivision and entry, while the Virginia land was sold in very large tracts under a totally different system. These diversities of tenure and title were a block and impediment in the way of the settlement of Ohio for a long time. Then the balance of the land was sold by Congress at $2 an acre on credit—a system which inevitably led to speculation and ultimate disaster. The early history of Ohio land titles and settlements was a painful struggle, which only became hopeful after a long period of poverty, disaster, and litigation.

Finally, the price of public land was reduced to $1.25 an acre, cash. In the meantime many of the old settlers were entirely broken up and unable to pay their back payments; in many cases they forfeited their land and it was afterward entered and paid for at $1.25 an acre. The course of the Government toward the State of Ohio at the beginning was unjust and illiberal. The beneficent land policy under which the new Western States have been settled had not then been devised. The aim of the General Government seemed to be to treat the public lands as property to be sold for as much money as possible, rather than as homes for the children of the old States, to be fostered with fatherly care.

So far as the 5 per cent. on all the land sold for cash is concerned, that has been paid to the State of Ohio and has been properly and honestly applied. If I remember aright, according to the enabling act 3 per cent. of that fund was set aside for making roads, and the General Government stipulated that it would make roads from the East to the West. That stipulation, like a good many other stipulations made by the Federal Government, was only partially carried into effect. It commenced years after to build what is called the Cumberland road, and did finally get it out about to the center of the State of Ohio, to Columbus, and there it slumbered for a long time; so that the United States did not even comply with the stipulation to build a road to these new settlers out there until many years after the stipulation had been made, and then left it incomplete in the center of the State, and it was never extended to the Mississippi River.

Mr. MORRILL. It was extended to Vandalia, Illinois.

Mr. SHERMAN. That was subsequently.

Mr. MORRILL. It would have been extended to the Mississippi but for some quarrel between the people of Saint Louis and Alton.

Mr. SHERMAN. At all events, that was long afterward; that was within my recollection.

Here is the way I look upon the question involved in this bill: the United States agreed in their contract with all these new States to give them 5 per cent. of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands within their States. This was made upon a valid consideration that the State would not tax the land while it was held by the Government, and would not tax it for five years after it had been sold by the Government.

It must be remembered that in early times it was the great object of the Government to sell the public lands. The idea of giving them to settlers for homesteads had not then occurred to the wisdom of Congress. They wanted to sell them for money, and every inducement was held out to get people to buy them. There was no objection then to selling the lands in large tracts. Here, then, was an agreement and a contract made between the State and the nation as to the public lands, by which the State was to have one-twentieth part of the land or the proceeds of it, and the United States nineteen-twentieths of the land or the proceeds of it. That was a clear and valid contract. Subsequently, by the adoption of a new policy—that is, the policy of issuing land-warrants and land-scrip in payment for military services which sprang up from the war of 1812, long after the land system had been adopted, long after the United States had by the enabling act entered into this agreement with Ohio, which was the beginning of the agreements between all the land States and the United States—the United States began to be more liberal in its land policy. Instead of trying to get the last dollar out of the early settlers the price of land was reduced from $2 to $1.25 an acre; then land-warrants issued for military service were received in payment for land, then the graduation policy was adopted by which poor lands were offered at reduced prices, then liberal grants of land were made to States for public improvements, and finally, in our time, the homestead policy was adopted, which completely reversed the old restrictions and illiberal policy.

The only question now open between the old States and the new is whether in stating the 5 per cent. fund given to the land States the land entered by military warrants shall be counted as a part of the public land sold by the United States. It is claimed by the land States that Congress issued military land warrants as pay to soldiers for military services rendered or to be rendered, and that they received such warrants as such compensation, and by themselves or their assignees received patents for a fixed quantity of the public lands. Congress sold this land as much by means of land warrants as if it had received a dollar and a quarter an acre for every acre. Why not? This was a disposition of the public lands. For what purpose? Not to increase the settlement, not to benefit the land States or the Western States, but it was either to induce people to enter into the military service of the United States or it was to compensate them for services which they had already rendered. Here was a disposition of a sale of the public lands, just as absolute and complete and no more beneficial to the people of the Western States than if the lands had been sold for a dollar and a quarter for every acre.

The agreement says that the State shall have 5 per cent. of the proceeds of the sale of the land. That agreement was made before these lands were sold. It gave to the State the benefit of one-twentieth part of the public lands, and that was little enough. With the present enlightened notions in regard to public lands the States might have got one-third or one-fourth, or the land would have been given under the homestead law without price; but, instead of that, Congress was then carrying out the policy of getting all it could out of the public lands, and it made the agreement that the State was to get one-twentieth part of the public lands, which the people of the State alone gave value to, which the labor of the men who went there and settled alone gave value to, and which enabled the Government to sell the rest of the lands. It was a harsh and unjust policy toward the settlement of a new country then adopted by the Government of the United States. I have no doubt it was adopted, as they thought, wisely. They looked upon the public lands as a source of revenue, but it was the labor of the very men who went and settled upon the land that made the rest of it valuable. They settled in a county, built up a neighborhood around them, and the lands were located, and families came and lived upon them. It was their labor that gave value to the residue of the land and enabled the Government to sell it.

Mr. MORRILL. May I ask the Senator a question? Was not the Government of the United States under a compact with Virginia that the land should be disposed of for the general welfare of all the States, rather than for any particular State?

Mr. SHERMAN. I am not familiar with that; but the title of Virginia was shadowy. The title of Virginia was exactly like the title of Connecticut. Virginia had a right to all the lands westerly and southerly of the forty-first parallel of latitude to the Indian Ocean. Where that was the people who wrote the charter of King James did not know; they thought it was out where the Mississippi River is. That was the general idea. These old grants given to Virginia read just that way; certain boundaries of land are specified, "thence westerly and southerly to the Indian Ocean." The grant to Connecticut was on the forty-first parallel of latitude westerly and northerly to the Indian Ocean. The grants under which these two States claimed the other States resisted, and in 1784, about the time of the passage of the law framed by Dane to organize the Northwestern Territory, these matters were adjusted in the Congress of the Confederation. If there was any agreement between Virginia and the Confederation it was made before the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, and I do not know that it has any binding effect; but even if the old Confederation did agree to do what was best with these public lands for the common good of the general welfare, we now would say that the best to do with those lands for the common good and general welfare was to invite every man to come and take a farm and go to work. We would give them all away now with our ideas of homestead, and we would be acting wisely for the general good and the benefit of the people; but then the idea was different, the idea was to sell the public lands for money. The United States agreed to give these Western States one-twentieth part if forsooth the States would not tax the lands at all until they were sold; if forsooth the State would let them go five years after they were sold free from tax.

Mr. MORRILL. I presume the Senator from Ohio means to state this accurately, and I desire to ask him if the condition in the enabling act was not that there should be one-twentieth part reserved, three-fifths of which in most of the acts was to be appropriated for canals and roads and for the improvement of levees, and the other two-fifths was to be devoted to educational or other purposes? I ask the Senator if instead of giving it to the States that was not the condition upon which most of the States received the grant?

Mr. SHERMAN. I suppose it was.

Mr. MORRILL. Then it shows that it was not to be paid into the State treasury, but it was to be paid out by the Government itself; three-fifths of it in these improvements and two-fifths of it in some other way.

Mr. SHERMAN. I stated a while ago when the Senator was not in that the Government of the United States undertook thus to manage 3 per cent. of this 5 per cent. It undertook to build roads from the East to the West, but no road was ever built to Ohio for many years after the land was sold, for the Cumberland road never reached Ohio until 1832, when the State of Ohio contained a million people. The Government of the United States in early times never kept its faith with the Western States any more than it did with the Indian tribes. There is no pretense of that kind. My friend is mistaken. I do not say this to create feeling between the East and West, because that has all died away, but there was uttered in the Senate and in the House of Representatives by the representatives of the younger States when they came here loud and distinct reprobation of the conduct of the older States. Mr. Webster was once called upon to defend the policy and conduct of the General Government as against the Western States.

Mr. HOAR. Does the Senator not suppose that Mr. Webster was right?

Mr. SHERMAN. Perhaps he was; I do not want to revive that; but I say the Government of the United States did not comply with its contract with the Western States. It never built the road which it agreed to build in 1802. It agreed to commence and build a road from the East to the West, to the people of Ohio. It never built the road, and the road never reached the soil of Ohio until 1832, if I remember aright; it was in Jackson's time at any rate. The Cumberland road finally reached the Ohio River thirty-odd years afterward, and in that time all this land had been sold and the money put in the Treasury of the United States. Then they tried to urge the building of the Cumberland road thirty years after the contract was made, as an offset against the payment of the 3 per cent. fund, but that was finally yielded, and the Government paid, I believe, the whole of the 5 per cent. on the lands actually sold.

Now, the question came up as to whether the United States ought not to pay the 5 per cent. on the lands they gave away for military services. There is the legal question. While I say that our people have no interest in it, that our interests are rather against the passage of this bill because we have grown so strong now that the payment of this money is two or three times the burden that the benefit to be derived by the payment of this hundred and some odd thousand dollars would be, I still feel nevertheless that the Western States have a right to this money, that the Government sold this land, and although they had promised to pay the proceeds to the extent of 5 per cent. to the States, gave it away for military services rendered or to be rendered, and it makes no difference which.

I could read here from the report of the committee to show you that at the time these men entered into the service in the war of 1812, at the time they entered into service in the Mexican war, they were promised land as a part of their pay. Mr. Corwin, one of my predecessors on the floor of the Senate, stated that this was a two-hundred-dollar payment or promise of payment to the soldier for services to be rendered. In other words, the Government was then not so rich as it is now, and it used this land to pay the soldiers with. Now we use our money to pay the soldiers with. A quarter section of land was considered to be a part of the pay of every soldier who enlisted in the service up until our civil war. There was no doubt about that; it was always considered that a quarter section of land went for a year's service as part of the pay of the soldier in the war of 1812, in the Mexican war, and in some of the Indian wars.

Mr. ALLISON. If I do not interrupt the Senator, I call his attention to the fact that one of these very statutes authorizes the soldier, instead of taking land, to take a one-hundred-dollar certificate on the Treasury in money.

Mr. SHERMAN. This land was used as a means of inducing men to enlist, or it was used as a means of paying men for services that they had rendered. I cannot distinguish between the two cases, and it seems to me it is a very narrow point to draw a line of demarkation upon. The State of Iowa is more interested in this bill than any other State. It in legal effect owned one-twentieth part of the lands of that State, or the proceeds thereof, by a stipulation made with that State when it was admitted. The United States owned nineteen-twentieths. On so much of these lands as was sold for money the State of Iowa has got her percentage, but the great body of the lands of that State was entered by land-warrants issued in the Mexican war. The public lands in that State were first opened to settlement at the close of the war. Entries were generally made with land-warrants. I know that myself, for I was there.

Mr. BLAIR. Does the Senator say that the great body of the State of Iowa was entered by land-warrants?

Mr. SHERMAN. The great body of the State, I think.

Mr. BLAIR. It would not cover one-third part of the surface of the State.

Mr. SHERMAN. How much is that?

Mr. BLAIR. About 50,000,000 acres, I think.

Mr. ALLISON. There are only 33,000,000 acres in Iowa, I am sorry to say.

Mr. BLAIR. Then if we divide it, it is only one-third of the surface of the State.

Mr. ALLISON. It is only 14,000,000 out of 33,000,000—very nearly half.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very nearly one-half the State of Iowa was given by land-warrants for—what? To pay the soldiers of the United States in the Mexican war. Suppose that land had been sold, 5 per cent. of it would have belonged to Iowa. Who prevented the sale for money? The Government of the United States. What right had the Government of the United States to divert that fund, one-twentieth part of which belonged to the State of Iowa? It had no right whatever; Iowa had a right to that. It exempted the Government land from taxation; its citizens had given it the value of their labor; it had agreed that for a certain time the land should be free from taxes. The State of Iowa had performed its contract in every particular. What right had the United States, then, to take the 5 per cent. and give it away to soldiers? It may have been a wise disposition. I think it was. No one complains of that; but the United States ought to have given either one-twentieth part of this land to the State of Iowa for a school fund or it ought to give now the money in lieu of that 5 per cent. for a school fund. This is not a mere question of law, it is a question of right and wrong, to be tested by the sense of justice between man and man.

Although this is a large amount, yet I believe it to be a just bill. Sir, if you and I were copartners, I owning 5 per cent. and you owning 95 per cent. of the proceeds of certain property, you could not so dispose of it or sell it as to deprive me of the right to my share of the proceeds. You could not deprive me of my 5 per cent. No court in Christendom would allow you to do it. Yet that was done in this case. The State of Iowa had a right to one-twentieth part of this land or the proceeds thereof for the education of the children of the State. It was not only their money but it was their money in trust, and the most sacred trust. You take the land on which they have this lien or right and apply it to pay your soldiers, to acquire more land down South, to acquire California, New Mexico, and Arizona, and having acquired that territory with the proceeds partially of the lands of the State of Iowa, you begrudge the payment to the State of Iowa of 5 per cent. of the amount of warrants located on land in Iowa, that you took for the purpose of paying the soldiers in the Mexican war. It does seem to me that equity, justice, and right between man and man, between the Government of the United States and the governments of the Western States, require us to pay over this 5 per cent.

Mr. BLAIR. Would the Senator permit me to ask him a question, as he seems to be arguing this case as though he were stating the facts, as he no doubt designs to do? The records are wrong or the Senator is wrong. The act which alone could have been any inducement to soldiers to enlist, offering a bounty, was the one of the 14th of February, 1847—I speak of the Mexican war—and under that only 88,000 warrants in all were issued, while 551,000 warrants were issued in consequence of legislation then and subsequently. Only one-fifth of the warrants actually issued were issued under the statute which could have offered any inducement to the soldier to enlist; the rest came in subsequently. Those only who rendered at least twelve months' service in the Mexican war were entitled to one hundred and sixty acres of land under the act of 1847, while those who enlisted for a shorter period drew a warrant of forty acres or eighty acres, as the case might be, but subsequent legislation opened the matter and gave a bounty-land warrant to the heirs of soldiers who had served in the Indian wars from the beginning——

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I do not lose my right to the floor.

Mr. BLAIR. Thus it is that this matter is put to the Senate and the country in an entirely wrongful aspect so far as these warrants are concerned as an inducement for military service.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from New Hampshire probably did not intend it, but he commenced his remarkable interruption by a very improper expression to be used in the Senate of the United States, by an inference that I was not stating the truth. Then he went on, in violation of the rules of the Senate, to interrupt me in a matter which had no connection whatever with the discussion. I do not care whether these land-warrants were issued——

Mr. BLAIR. I wish to disclaim any intention of ascribing any untruthful statement to the Senator from Ohio in any other sense than that the statement itself was incorrect, and to set it right by reference to the statistics of the country.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator tries to show that warrants for only so many, I do not know how many, thousand acres of land were issued before the service was rendered, and warrants for so many thousand acres were issued after the service was rendered. I do not care anything about his facts or his figures, because they have no bearing upon this case. If these land-warrants were issued by the United States in payment for services either rendered or to be rendered the United States is bound to account for the land-warrants as for land sold. Whether issued to tempt the soldier to fight or to pay for his service after he had fought, it makes no difference. The Senator, therefore, is pursuing a distinction in which there is no difference; he is trying to draw the line between the land-warrants issued before the services were rendered by the soldier and the land-warrants that were issued afterward. It is sufficient to say that the United States took the lands upon which these Western States had a lien of 5 per cent. and used them to pay its soldiers either for services rendered or to be rendered, and now it refuses to pay the 5 per cent. it stipulated for in the enabling acts.

Mr. President, it does seem to me that this is a clear case; and although the sum is large, and it goes to States probably that are not needy, yet I believe it would be better to wipe out this whole controversy, which has existed here for I know twenty-eight years. Since I have been a member of Congress in one or the other House this question in some of its forms has been presented year after year and year after year.

Mr. MORRILL. What is the amount?

Mr. SHERMAN. The amount is $3,900,000, as stated, but that is more than the actual amount. I have this to say: that the table furnished is larger than the actual amount, because the table furnished includes all the land sold within the States. Some of it was sold before the States were admitted, and that is expressly excluded by the terms of the bill, and it is very properly excluded.

In regard to the Virginia military land-warrants, if all the warrants issued by the State of Virginia and which were located in Ohio were to be accounted for under this bill the amount would be much larger, but the bill confines the allowance of Ohio to those warrants located after the State was admitted. Consequently the amount is comparatively small, but in justice and equity, upon the general principles embraced in the enabling act, the people of Ohio were entitled for school purposes to 5 per cent. on all the lands sold by the United States by such grants as that to Symmes and in the reservation to Connecticut and to Virginia; but these questions are forever settled, and Ohio, no longer containing any public lands, is willing to do that justice to her sister States in the West that it has often demanded for herself.

By the terms of the bill the amount to be received by Ohio is insignificant. So far as that State is concerned I do not care and Ohio does not care anything about it, whether this bill passes or not. I vote for it because I believe the United States owes this money to the land States and because I believe it is equitable and right.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. My friend from Ohio spoke of the amount involved in the bill, but did not name it. May I ask him how much is involved?

Mr. SHERMAN. All I know about it is that in the table furnished by gentlemen I see it is put at $3,900,000, but that is subject to some deduction. According to the table furnished by the Senator from New Hampshire it includes all the land located in those States.

Mr. BLAIR. It includes what the Land Office says is covered by the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. The communication from the Land Office reads:

> In reply to your verbal inquiry relative to the quantity of land located with military bounty-land warrants up to date, in all the States, &c.

Then it gives them all. Some of this land, however, was located while the States were Territories, and by the bill those lands are excluded, how much I do not know. The whole amount is $3,947,000.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I wish to say one word merely in regard to the last sentence uttered by the Senator from Ohio. It is hardly just in his recital of the history of this matter to speak of any portion of the Ohio lands as being applied to Massachusetts. Massachusetts obtained no grant of these lands. There was a grant to a company of settlers, which I suppose would have been made by any State in the Union having unoccupied land at that time, to have an actual settlement begun in the Ohio Territory; and it was for that purpose alone that this grant was made. There was no grant of the land or property of pecuniary value to Massachusetts, or to any Massachusetts person. Rufus Putnam, Manassa Cutler, and their associates took from Massachusetts a body of its very best citizens, many of them revolutionary soldiers who after the war preferred to make a settlement in this new Territory.

Although Massachusetts had her claim as Connecticut did, extending by her original grant to the Pacific Ocean, what was called the South Sea at the time her charter was granted, she made no stipulation either in money or land as the equivalent for that cession; but she did make one stipulation, and that is she stipulated that those great Territories to be formed into States should be forever dedicated to freedom. The great ordinance of 1787 drawn up by Nathan Dane, the original of which, in his handwriting, is now existing in this Capitol, was the only equivalent for which she stipulated in parting with her valuable claim to the western country.

Mr. SHERMAN. I did not intend in what I said to call in question the propriety of the conduct of our revolutionary ancestors in regard to these lands, but only to state the facts.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will pardon me; he will find in looking at the report of his remarks that he spoke of land granted to Connecticut and land granted to Massachusetts, and his history was quite an interesting one, indicating apparently an idea in his mind that there had been a valuable grant to Massachusetts or a reserve by her. That is not the fact.

Mr. SHERMAN. If I had been reading up within the last few days a history of the controversy in 1784 I would have been able to state it more accurately, but there was a controversy between what are called the land States and those who held no land in 1784, which led to the reservations and grants to which I referred, which led to the cession by Virginia and Connecticut and their reservations. Citizens of Massachusetts formed a company which I suppose was organized under the laws of Massachusetts. Lands were granted to this company, but not to the State. It was this company of Massachusetts people known as the Ohio Company that made the first settlement in Ohio. They bought by contract with Congress. I do not recall how much, but I have traveled all over that country on foot and on horseback. The corporation or association was a colony, and the leading members went out and settled upon these lands, and these settlers and their descendants have been from that day to this among the leading citizens of that State. My own ancestor was carried to Ohio by the Connecticut grant. He went out there as a commissioner from the State of Connecticut to mark out the fire lands from the Western Reserve, and was interested also as a sufferer by fire during the revolutionary war. I do not speak of these early transactions or of the land policy of those days with a view to call into question the conduct of these gentlemen in any respect, but simply to show the harsh policy as to the public lands first adopted by the General Government. Ohio was then the only land State in which the General Government had any public land. In Kentucky and Tennessee the vacant land was owned by Virginia and North Carolina; Michigan was then not occupied; Indiana could not be reached because Ohio lay in the way. The old States got reservations or purchased lands in Ohio for the settlement of their people; some by reservations or grants to the State, some by grants to corporations, some by grants to associations. In that way the first settlement of the public land was effected. The new system has changed all this.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Senator from Ohio is of course familiar with these transactions, but by a slip of the tongue I think he referred to a sale of land to Connecticut.

Mr. SHERMAN. No, I did not mean a sale.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Senator spoke of a sale of land to Connecticut.

Mr. SHERMAN. I said a grant, and Connecticut ceded to the United States its claim to the Western territories, as they were called, and reserved north of the forty-first parallel latitude west 120 miles. That is what I said.

Mr. HAWLEY. Connecticut ceded the whole of her jurisdiction over and title to the soil of the land west of her reservation on a belt corresponding in width to that of Connecticut herself, out as far as the King of Great Britain or his successors had any rights—that is, to the Mississippi.

Mr. SHERMAN. "To the Indian Ocean."

Mr. HAWLEY. "To the South Sea" was the original charter. "South Sea" is the exact expression, I think, of the charters of 1630 and 1662. Of course they could go no farther than the King of Great Britain had title—that is, to the Mississippi River. Beginning at a meridian crossing the forty-first parallel at a point one hundred and twenty miles west of the line of Pennsylvania, and extending eastward to Pennsylvania, Connecticut reserved an area about equal to her own size. She granted also 500,000 acres of land to those who had suffered losses (including some ancestors of the Senator himself) in the burning of Danbury, Norwalk, Fairfield, New London, and Groton. The damages inflicted by the British were all carefully listed and estimated, and the so-called "fire lands" were granted to cover them. This reserve, to which she had every title in the world, jurisdictional title and title to the soil also, a pretty good-sized tract, as large as the present State herself, Connecticut converted into a school fund. The reservation was made in 1786. In 1797 she tendered to the United States the jurisdiction over that land, and in 1800 it was accepted by the United States. But it was our own land by the charters from Great Britain, not sold or given to us by the Confederacy of States.

Mr. PLATT. May I inquire of the Senator from Ohio whether he goes so far as to claim that these new States obtained the right to one-twentieth of all the lands within their borders? I certainly understood from his argument that they by these enabling acts got one-twentieth part of the title to all the lands within their borders. Now, I wish to inquire whether his claim goes to that extent; and if so, why this 5 per cent. should not be paid on all homestead entries, on all that has been given to different railroad enterprises, on all that has been given the States for educational purposes, and on all swamp-lands granted, as well as on the military land-warrants?

Mr. SHERMAN. That matter was discussed years ago, and the distinctions were pointed out very clearly. I supposed Senators were perfectly familiar with the distinction taken between the grants for railroad purposes and these military land-warrants. The military land-warrants were issued for the common defense of the United States at large. The grants under the swamp act, and also under the railroad acts, were grants to the States; the whole land was ceded to the States for certain purposes. As a matter of course the cession to the State merged in the State the whole land, 5 per cent. and all, and as a matter of course it would be inequitable, and unjust, and improper, when the State itself had acquired the title to all the land that was afterward ceded to corporations for railroad purposes, for it to set up a claim to 5 per cent. on the value of the land. The well-known principle of law applies, that where a man acquires title to a piece of land in which he already has a partial interest the interest he already holds is merged. As a matter of course that is the answer to that, and it has been stated over and over again in the reports made——

Mr. PLATT. That does not apply to the homestead entries, nor to lands which have been granted in aid of private corporations and not granted to the States.

Mr. SHERMAN. My impression is that the lands within the States granted for railroad purposes were granted to the States. That will be found to be the case. All the grants of land within a State have always been made to the State, and then the State has ceded them to the railroad companies. The reason for that has been that the States themselves then have the disposition and control of the corporations which they create for the purpose of building railroads. In the Territories it has been different.

Mr. PLATT. The Senator is doubtless more familiar with that subject than I am, but is not this true, that sometimes they have been granted to the State merely as the trustee of the corporation?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes; but so far as railroad lands are concerned, they only took alternate sections, and the remaining lands were sold at $2.50 an acre, and 5 per cent. was paid on those sales, so that the principle was carried out.

Mr. SHERMAN. All these distinctions have been stated over and over again in debate. Where the land was ceded to the State, as a matter of course the State could not set up any claim to 5 per cent. on that land.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio if he claims, what would seem to be the logic of his argument, that the lands which have been homesteaded should also be paid for? That is not in this bill; but what is the distinction in his mind?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the distinction is very broad. When the United States parts with the land, giving it to actual settlers, it is quite a different thing. That is for the general good and the general welfare. The land is given to promote settlement in these communities. It would be inequitable and unjust to give the States 5 per cent. on lands so granted.

Mr. McMILLAN. Will the Senator from Ohio permit me to call his attention to a specific provision in the act authorizing the people of the Territory of Minnesota to form a constitution and State government, preparatory to their admission into the Union on an equal footing with the original States? Section 5 provides:

That 5 per cent. of the net proceeds of sales of all public lands lying within said State which shall be sold by Congress after the admission of the said State into the Union, after deducting all the expenses incident to the same, shall be paid to said State, for the purpose of making public roads and internal improvements as the Legislature shall direct: Provided, The foregoing propositions herein offered are on the condition that the said convention which shall form the constitution of said State shall provide by a clause in said constitution or an ordinance, irrevocable without the consent of the United States, that said State shall never interfere with the primary disposal of the soil within the same by the United States, or with any regulations Congress may find necessary for securing the title in said soil to bona fide purchasers thereof; and that no tax shall be imposed on lands belonging to the United States, and that in no case shall non-resident proprietors be taxed higher than residents.

Here is an express contract by the Government of the United States with the State of Minnesota, upon her admission into the Union, that this 5 per cent. should be paid, and the only question that can arise is whether or not where a person buys land of the United States and pays for it by a military bounty-land warrant that is a sale of the land by the Government of the United States within the meaning of that section. If it were paid for in cash there could be no doubt whatever about it, and the Government concedes it and has paid 5 per cent. on cash sales. It is precisely the same, and the land officers received the fees for the sale of the land by the Government, prescribed by act of Congress, where the Government received in payment for its land a bounty-land warrant, not from the soldier, but from any person who might be the owner of it. The land warrant is assignable at all times, and is a matter of negotiation in all the banking establishments of the country; it passes just the same as money.

Mr. ALLISON. May I call the attention of the Senator from Minnesota to the fact that these land-warrants were received as money at the land offices? You could pay for one hundred and sixty acres partly in a land-warrant and partly in money. They were received as cash.

Mr. McMILLAN. There was no difference between them. You could pay for land partly in cash and partly in a warrant, as suggested by the Senator from Iowa, and whether or not this is a sale of the land is the only question open for discussion here. It seems to me there can be no reasonable doubt about it under a fair construction of the contract.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. SAULSBURY,] which will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Acting Secretary read the amendment.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, the immediate question before the Senate is the amendment which I offered to the pending bill. I have said on that amendment all that I propose to say, and did not propose at this time to enter upon the discussion of the merits of this bill. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] has, however, gone into a discussion of the whole question, and in the course of his speech he made a remark that somewhat surprised me. He stated that this question in some of its forms had been before Congress for twenty-five years. I never heard of its being here till about 1878. There was a cognate question here for several years, but not this question, growing out of what was called the 2 per cent. claim set up by Indiana, Illinois, and Ohio. That question had been before Congress for a very considerable time, and has been rejected by Congress on two or three different occasions, but I have not heard that any claim had been made for 5 per cent. upon the value of lands located by military land-warrants until that question was brought into this body, I think, for the first time in 1878. There was, I repeat, a question in reference to the 2 per cent. retained by the Government by consent of those States out of the proceeds of land actually sold for the purpose of constructing a public road leading to the West. The Senator from Ohio in the remarks he submitted complained that the Government had not kept the stipulation in the expenditure of that 2 per cent. with the State of Ohio, and said that the Cumberland road, which it was intended that money should be applied to, was only constructed through a part of the State.

I was surprised to hear that complaint of the Senator, because a former Senator from the State of Ohio had acknowledged that the Government of the United States as far back as 1825 had discharged its obligation as to the expenditure of the 2 per cent. so far as it applied to the State of Ohio. In 1825 Mr. Ruggles, a Senator from that State, addressed the Senate upon this particular question, the construction of the Cumberland road to the West, and I will read what he said, which was a very different statement from that made by the Senator from Ohio in his remarks a little while ago. Mr. Ruggles said:

> Ohio was the first State that was admitted into the Union upon this principle—

That is, on the principle of 5 per cent., 2 per cent. of which should be retained by the Government for the purpose of constructing a public highway from the East to the West—

> Ohio was the first State that was admitted into the Union upon this principle. This took place in 1803. When the 2 per cent. which had been reserved for the purpose of making a road leading to that State had accumulated so as to justify an expenditure, Congress passed a law, in 1806, authorizing commissioners to be appointed to survey and lay out a road from Cumberland, in Maryland, to the State of Ohio.
> After the survey and location were completed, annual appropriations were made by Congress for constructing the road, until it was finally completed from Cumberland to Wheeling, on the Ohio River, a distance of one hundred and thirty-five miles. This road lies entirely within the States of Maryland, Pennsylvania, and Virginia. Not one rod is within any of the new States. The contract with the State of Ohio is fulfilled; the road has been made to the boundary of that State; the 2 per cent. that has arisen, and will hereafter arise, has all been expended. Ohio, therefore, has no further claim upon Congress for any portion of the 2 per cent. which may be produced by the future sales of land in that State. It is but justice to admit that a greater sum of money has been expended in making the Cumberland road than the 2 per cent. would amount to in the State of Ohio. This excess must be considered as a direct appropriation from the Treasury for the accomplishment of a great national object, in which the whole western country had a direct and beneficial interest.

That was the utterance of a Senator from the State of Ohio in 1825, and yet the Senator from Ohio to-day charges that the Government of his country had been wanting in faith to the State of Ohio in reference to the 2 per cent. retained for the construction of a road to that State. That is the question, the 2 per cent. question, which had been here year after year until, I think, it was abandoned after 1876 and this new project brought in of giving 5 per cent. on all the lands that had heretofore been located by military land warrants. So far as I have any knowledge, the claim that is now made is entirely a new claim; for when the question of the 2 per cent. upon the lands that were actually sold was before Congress, the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois were claiming that Congress should pay to them the 2 per cent. which it had reserved, this question of 5 per cent. upon the public lands which had been located with land-warrants was not brought into discussion, was not dreamed of at that day, so far as I know, by any Senator on this floor; and it was never until after the Congress of the United States had resisted the improper claims of Ohio, and Illinois, and Indiana to the 2 per cent., and by repeated reports of Committees on the Judiciary had demonstrated that there was no valid claim to be made to that fund then retained by the Government—it was never until that question was put at rest by two or three able reports that this question of the 5 per cent. on the value of the public lands which had been located by military land-warrants was brought to the attention of Congress.

There had been a claim made by the State of Iowa before one of the Executive Departments of the Government as far back as 1858. The then governor, I believe it was, of the State came to Washington and conferred with the Secretary of the Interior, making such a claim as is now embraced in the bill; at least a claim predicated upon the location of lands by military land-warrants. I believe he took the distinction at that time that where they were a bounty given to soldiers for services which had been rendered, and not a reward paid for services to be rendered, the State he represented had not proper claim. After a personal interview he addressed a letter to the Secretary of the Interior, Jacob Thompson, calling his attention to this distinction, which was read to the Senate by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] in the discussion of this question a few years ago. Mr. Thompson in a written reply informed him that by the terms of the enabling act upon which Iowa was admitted, and upon which this claim is predicated, there was nothing due to the State of Iowa, because it was the net proceeds of the sales of lands actually sold that was promised.

That decision of the Interior Department, so far as I am informed, at any rate so far as any legislative recognition of the claim has been had, that decision of the Secretary of the Interior in reference to the right of the State of Iowa to this fund, was acquiesced in, at least so far as we can judge from the records of this body and of the other House. It was not, as I again repeat, until after the disposition of the 2 per cent. claim made by the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois that this claim was brought to the attention of Congress; so that the Senator from Ohio was egregiously mistaken when he uttered the remark that this claim had been in some of its forms before the Congress of the United States for the last twenty-five years.

Now, in reference to the Cumberland road, as it was brought into the discussion by the Senator from Ohio, I will say that the construction of the Cumberland road, designed especially for the benefit of the Western States, and upon which the Government of the United States expended over $6,000,000, was not only a discharge of this obligation to the State of Ohio, as was admitted by Senator Ruggles in 1825, but it was also a discharge of the obligation to Indiana and to Illinois so far as the 2 per cent. was concerned, because there was over $1,000,000 spent in the State of Indiana on the Cumberland road and some $750,000 spent in the State of Illinois upon the same road. The contract of the Government with the State of Indiana and with the State of Illinois and with the State of Missouri was not that this Government should build a road through those States, but a road leading to those States; and the construction of the Cumberland road to Springfield in the State of Ohio, with a large amount of work done upon it in the State of Indiana and the State of Illinois, involved the expenditure of more money than would have arisen from the 2 per cent. which they claimed a few years ago, and perhaps which they may still claim as having been retained improperly by the Government of the United States.

That is all I desire to say in reference to that 2 per cent. claim. So far as that claim is concerned, the Government has discharged its obligation to the States of Indiana, Illinois, and Ohio. They have, therefore, no further claim upon this Government in that regard.

Now I proceed to the bill under consideration. I desire to say, Mr. President, that there are some features of this bill that I do not like. In the first place, when you take up the bill you find that it is a measure proposed to take out of the Treasury of the United States, the common Treasury of the whole country, money placed there by taxation upon the people, arising not from the sales of public lands in any of these States but money in the Treasury placed there by taxation upon the people of the whole country, and this bill proposes deliberately to put in the public Treasury the hands of eighteen States of this Union and take out a part of that money for their own special benefit. I say this general feature of this measure will not commend it to the favorable consideration of the people of this country, and in my opinion ought not to commend it to the favorable consideration of the Senate. It is a direct proposition made in the Senate of the United States to take from the public Treasury a large amount of money and transfer it to the treasuries of the several States named in this bill. So the general aspect of this question, apart from any other consideration, I do not hesitate to say ought to be sufficient to insure its rejection by the Senate.

But there is another feature of this bill that is still more objectionable to my mind. If the States named in this bill have proper claims on the Government, why not bring them forward as distinct and separate measures? Why should they be brought into hotchpotch in this bill? No one here has a suspicion, of course, that there was any purpose to combine these separate claims in order to consolidate the votes of Senators whose States are interested; but outside of the Senate Chamber, where the virtues of Senators are not so highly appreciated and where criticism is indulged more freely on the action of this body than here, there will be found some persons, it may be evil-minded persons, to suggest that the reason for such a combination of interests was that the particular merits of the claims of individual States should not be scanned, but that by placing all in a common bill the States should in a lump pass their claims upon the Treasury by the united votes of their Senators. These States came into the Union at different times and under different circumstances, and the enabling acts contain different conditions and stipulations; and if the several States embraced in this bill have valid claims let them come in the ordinary way of legislation, and not by a system of bringing several States together in the same bill seek to pass them all by the same vote. Outside of the Senate Chamber it will be supposed to be the object of those who concocted this bill originally, the agents and attorneys of the States interested, that by a combination of interests, a union of several States in this bill, they could secure the votes of the members from those several States because of the particular interests which their States may have had in the bill.

Mr. VEST. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Certainly.

Mr. VEST. What is the difference between one bill covering all the States, and passing upon the claim of an individual State in a single case, establishing a precedent binding on the Government in other cases?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I will say to the Senator that while he may be able in his own mind to come to the conclusion that there is no difference, yet, outside of this Chamber, where the actions of the Senate of the United States are scrutinized with less charity than we scrutinize our own acts, the public opinion will be, I apprehend, that the reason for the combination of the several States embraced in this bill was to secure the support of the members of the Senate whose States were interested in the bill. Whether it will have that effect is yet to be seen. The question is whether it is proper to put the bill in a form that upon the public mind will make the impression that the bill was so framed for the object which I have named.

Apart from these general aspects of the bill, and in reference to its merits, upon what is this claim predicated? I listened to the argument of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] who reported this measure and who has pressed its consideration with a great deal of energy and zeal and ability, and I understand from his speech and from the report of the committee that it is based upon a contract made between the Government of the United States and the several States embraced in this bill in their enabling acts. He said the States were not here to ask for charity; they were here to demand right; and he placed this claim upon a valid and subsisting agreement between the General Government and the States embraced in the bill.

I submit that if it were possible (and I believe it is possible) to take this case to a court to interpret the contract, what would it be? The agreement is upon certain conditions that the Government will pay the States 5 per cent. of the net proceeds of the sales of the public lands within their limits. That was the contract, and there is no frittering it away by any latitudinarian interpretation of the word "sale," because it had a legal signification then, and it has now. The men who used that term in the enabling acts knew its import fully as well as we understand it.

When you put these States on the terms of their contract, if you see proper to call the provisions of the enabling act a contract or a compact binding on the respective parties, I say if there is anything coming to either of these States by a proper legal construction of any of the terms used in the enabling acts, I will certainly vote to give it. But every Senator who has spoken in favor of this claim has talked about a broad and liberal construction, and not a strict legal interpretation of the terms employed in the contract. If I did not misunderstand the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] this morning, acknowledged to be one of the ablest lawyers in the country, he did not come down to the strict construction by the acknowledged rules of interpretation of the language employed in the enabling acts, but put himself upon a broad and generous and liberal interpretation of the terms used in the enabling acts, in order that he might sustain the claim.

But, sir, I hold that when that compact or contract, if you may so call it, was entered into between the General Government and the State of Ohio, the policy of the Government in reference to public lands and the rewarding of soldiers for meritorious services by the distribution of public lands among them was a policy known not only to the General Government but known also to the State of Ohio. As early as 1776, before the General Government had any lands and but a bare possibility of acquiring public lands, it promised to give to the soldiers who served in the Revolution a portion of the public domain which might be acquired; and Virginia, interested in the struggle for our independence, anxious for the common rights of all the people, induced her soldiers to go into the war by the promise of lands, and generously afterward redeemed her promise by securing a reservation out of the public lands she generously ceded to the Government ample to fulfill and meet the obligations that she had entered into with her soldiers.

It was the recognized policy of this country even as early as 1802, when Ohio was admitted into the Union, that a portion of the public domain should be set apart for the soldiers who had served and should thereafter serve in the wars of the country. It is not to be presumed that it entered into the contemplation of Congress when it passed these enabling acts, or into the contemplation of the State of Ohio, or the convention of what is now the State of Ohio, when she accepted the terms and conditions of the enabling act of Congress, that the Government had abandoned its settled policy of rewarding the soldiers by military land-warrants and intended to deprive itself of the liberty of donating lands embraced within the State of Ohio to the soldier for the services he had rendered the country. So with all the States entering into the Union. This has been the settled policy of the Government. It promised 5 per cent., it is true, of the net proceeds of the sales of the public lands, but it did not enter into the contemplation of Congress that it had abandoned the policy of rewarding the soldiers by giving them public lands within the limits of Ohio or any other State of the Union on which they might locate, nor were such enabling acts and the conditions there appended accepted by any State of the Union with any understanding on their part that the Government of the United States had abandoned its generous policy and that they were to have 5 per cent. upon the value of lands taken up by military land-warrants. No such idea was then entertained, and the proposition of this bill is an afterthought, as unjust as it is absurd and preposterous.

I say, then, looking at these enabling acts in the light of the surrounding circumstances at the time of enactment, independent of the word used in the contract itself, fully understood by the Government and the States in accepting the proffered aid of the General Government, we can come to no other conclusion than that the claim now set up is in violation of the distinct understanding on the part both of the Government and of the States respectively accepting the bounty of the General Government.

But without looking to the circumstances under which these enabling acts were passed, looking away from the surrounding circumstances, which might properly be taken into consideration in giving a proper interpretation to the intent of the parties to the agreements, and confining ourselves to the language used in the contract, I am utterly amazed that any lawyer or that any Senator can come to the conclusion, which I have no doubt many of them have already done, that this is a valid and legal claim which these States are demanding of the Government.

What are the terms of the contract upon which they say they stand? It uses a well-defined term, "sale"—"sale of the public lands;" "the net proceeds of the sale of the public lands." What do those terms mean? Do they mean the disposition of the public lands to soldiers as bounty for services rendered the country, or in any other way the Government might see proper to dispose of them under the homestead laws or otherwise? If the construction now contended for is to be placed upon the terms of these contracts, then a claim may be set up on the part of those States for lands taken under the homestead laws for lands donated for educational purposes given the States themselves, for the swamp lands, for the lands granted for railroad purposes, and for all the lands which the Government in its generosity has given to these respective States.

I repeat, if the construction now contended for of these enabling acts is correct, then this Government has no security against any claim that may hereafter be set up for land taken in the several States of the Union under the homestead laws, or under grants to corporations for the purpose of building railroads in those States, or under grants to the States themselves for educational or other purposes, and they might just as well come here and claim, so far as a legal claim can be made, and make as valid and legal a claim even for the swamp lands in these respective States as they can for the lands which the Government has disposed of to its soldiers.

Mr. MAXEY. I would ask the Senator from Delaware on this point whether the allowance of a certain percentage, 5 per cent., upon the sales of the public lands means, as a question of law, that the Government is bound to pay 5 per cent. on the net proceeds of the lands sold? Is the Government in any wise bound to pay the percentage on lands disposed of otherwise than by sale?

Mr. SAULSBURY. The Government is not bound by the terms of these enabling acts to confine itself to one mode of disposition of the public lands, but may dispose of them as in its judgment it may think proper to dispose of them, and is only bound to the States for the land disposed of by actual sale. The term "sale" has a proper legal signification. There must be a seller and a buyer and a consideration paid in money in order to constitute a sale. All the lawbooks, I believe, in substance regard that as the proper definition of a sale; but we are not left to the general law on this subject, because it has received a construction from Congress away back in the past, and stands construed upon your statute-books which point out what is the meaning of the term "sales of the public lands." There is provision made for the sale of the public lands in the laws; but before I proceed to that permit me to say that the Government never sells lands by statute. It never has done it. I has authorized sales to be made under statutes and regulated the manner in which the sales shall be made, both public and private, but there has never been a sale of the public lands by act of Congress so far as I know; and yet it is insisted that acts of Congress which gave bounty warrants to the soldiers were sales of the land. So far as I know, there never has been a sale made by statute, by an act of Congress, to convey a title to land. There may have been such, but I am not aware of it; but, so far as the public domain of the country is concerned, no part of that has been sold in any other manner than the manner prescribed by the acts of Congress regulating the mode and manner of the disposition of the public lands.

I find in the statutes that there is provision for two kinds of sales: first, a public sale of lands, and then a private sale of lands; and without stopping to read the provisions of the law on this subject, I call attention to the fact that the public lands of this country are to be sold and disposed of as Congress has directed in the public statutes. I will read section 2358 of the Revised Code:

> Whenever the President is authorized to cause the public lands, in any land district, to be offered for sale, he may offer for sale, at first, only a part of the lands contained in such district, and at any subsequent time or times he may offer for sale in the same manner any other part, or the remainder of the lands contained in the same.

Section 2359 provides how a public sale of public lands shall be made:

> The public lands which are exposed to public sale by order of the President shall be advertised for a period of not less than three nor more than six months prior to the day of sale, unless otherwise specially provided.

Then it provides in reference to private sales how they may be effected. It is not, therefore, I say, granting lands by acts of Congress, or disposing of them to the soldiers by acts of Congress giving them bounties that constitutes a sale, or that was within the contemplation of the Congress at the time the enabling acts of these States were passed. Then, what was meant by the "proceeds of sales," because they not only used the term "sale," which has a well-defined meaning, but the acts used the term "net proceeds of sales?" Can it be possible that when Congress passed enabling acts for the several States they meant to say by those acts that any parcel of land located with a military land-warrant was to be included in that term? What would be the net proceeds of the sale of such a tract?

Mr. McMILLAN. Will the Senator from Delaware allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Yes, sir.

Mr. McMILLAN. What is the minimum price fixed by the law of Congress for the sales of public lands?

Mr. SAULSBURY. One dollar and twenty-five cents an acre.

Mr. McMILLAN. Then she sells her land and receives payment in whatever she prescribes she shall receive.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I beg pardon; is there a provision in the public statutes that there is anything to be received but money for the sale of public lands?

Mr. McMILLAN. The Senator from Delaware is mistaken in that. He will find that wherever lands have been once offered at public sale, they are then subject to private sale at any of the land offices in the United States, and any subdivision of the lands surveyed by the United States can be purchased at not less than $1.25 per acre and be paid for in cash or its equivalent, a land-warrant issued by the United States.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I was aware of that, but it is an exception to the general law regulating sales of the public lands of which I was speaking.

Mr. McMILLAN. If a fractional section is desired to be purchased containing sixty-six acres, the purchaser can buy it and give a forty-acre land-warrant and the balance in cash and receive one patent for the fractional section.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I am aware that there has been an act enabling the holders of military scrip to use that in payment of lands instead of locating the lands exclusively with cash if they thought proper to do so. But that is only where the lands have been previously offered at public sale and not sold. It has nothing to do, however, with the matter under discussion, nor does it affect in the least the position I am seeking to maintain in this debate. The public lands under the laws regulating their sale must be sold for cash, except as has been stated by the Senator from Minnesota, and that exception does not alter the rule, because it only applies to lands previously offered for sale. I am aware of that, but that does not alter the general proposition. The general laws regulating the sales of public land require a cash payment. There has been a special statute to which he refers for the purpose of enabling persons who were the holders of these warrants to use them in payment of lands after they had been offered at public sale and could be disposed of at private sale. And 5 per cent. on land located with military land-warrants is now claimed under this bill.

A claim is made in this bill for 5 per cent. on the value of lands located by military land-warrants.

Mr. McMILLAN. That is the claim.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Looking at this question with a view to ascertain the validity of such a claim, I am unable to see anything which entitles it to be considered in the light of a just claim upon the Government. There is nothing in the enabling acts of the several States or the circumstances under which they were passed that can justify such a construction as is now sought to be put upon the terms used in these enabling acts, and nothing connected with the transaction that justifies the belief that it entered into the consideration of either of the parties, the General Government or the respective States, that the lands located with military land-warrants were to be considered in any sense a sale of the lands according to the language used in the enabling acts.

If this claim had been rested upon equitable considerations alone, it would have been a different question. I do not think they ever had any legal claim, and perhaps it was because they were perfectly satisfied that there was no equitable claim on the part of these States for the further bounty of the Government that they have seen proper to rest this claim exclusively upon its legal aspect and bearing. If these States should set up an equitable claim to this money, if they should come here and say to this high court of chancery, "You have taken the lands within our limits; you have deprived us of the benefits we otherwise would have obtained from the sale of those lands, and now we feel that you as an act of equity ought to give us an equivalent 5 per cent. of the lands located with military land-warrants within our limits," they would at once be met by facts and considerations which would prove that they have no equitable claim.

The Government has been liberal, has been bountiful, munificent to all these States. There is not a single State embraced in this bill but what has been a recipient time and again of the favors of the Government, and even at the present session of Congress we have passed a bill through the Senate for the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi River, in the improvement of which every State embraced in this bill is interested, unless perhaps it be Nevada. We have passed a bill appropriating $6,000,000 for that improvement, in which Indiana, Illinois, Ohio, all the Northwestern States, are interested, except perhaps Michigan. Vast expenditures have been made for the benefit of the new States. The Government has built a magnificent public building in Saint Louis, costing three or four or five million dollars, and buildings costing even a greater amount in Chicago and in Cincinnati. These States have been recipients of the liberality and bounty of the Government; so that when they come here with an equitable claim they will be met by reminders of the charity, if I may use the term, by the liberality of the General Government exhibited toward them.

I am informed that 70,000,000 acres of swamp land alone have been given away to these States; to some more and to some less. Large land-grants for the purpose of building railroads in the States have been made. The donations of public lands to the States for educational purposes have been vast, and I believe I saw a statement—I do not know how true it may be—that Michigan, one of the claimant States, had had about 13,000,000 acres of public lands for one purpose or another; that Indiana and Illinois had had respectively very large grants of public lands. So it is with all these States. So that if they had predicated their claim to this money upon equitable grounds there would be counter-claims in the nature of favors bestowed. I suppose it was a knowledge of that fact that induced the friends of this bill to base it not upon an equitable but upon a legal claim against the Government.

Under this bill, according to a statement which is published in the RECORD, the following sums will be paid to the States named:

States.	Five per cent.
Alabama	$72,475 69
Arkansas	141,306 44
California	50,714 44
Colorado	12,191 25
Florida	29,317 57
Iowa	881,239 13
Illinois	595,866 32
Indiana	82,027 32
Kansas	270,741 12
Louiciana	72,425 19
Michigan	270,704 63
Minnesota	373,393 25
Mississippi	24,061 13
Missouri	426,186 82
Nebraska	121,202 38
Nevada	666 25
Ohio	113,593 88
Oregon	4,949 31
Wisconsin	404,111 38
Total	3,947,173 50

These are the beneficiaries under this bill. The other States of this Union of course get nothing, and the rest of the States of this Union have contributed to the fund out of which it is to be paid. Mr. President, there is, in my opinion, no legal or equitable claim on the part of the States enumerated in the bill to the money it is proposed to take from the Treasury for their benefit. Such an appropriation of the public money is unjust to the people who have paid it into the Treasury, and, in my opinion, ought not to be made.

I have now said all I desire to say upon this subject.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to submit an amendment to the bill under consideration, which I ask to have printed. I shall offer it hereafter. It is strike out all of the bill after the word "the" where it occurs the second time, in line 15, and insert:

Court of Claims; and shall give notice of such certificate to the governor of each of the said States.

SEC. 2. Either of said States may within two years from the filing of such certificate institute a suit in the Court of Claims for such amount as it may claim to be due on account of lands located therein by military scrip and land warrants. Said lands shall be estimated by the court at the rate of $1.25 per acre. The Attorney-General shall represent the United States in the defense of such suits and either party may appeal to the Supreme Court as in other cases. The judgment thereon shall be binding on the States and on the United States.

The proposed amendment was ordered to be printed.

Mr. FARLEY. I offer several amendments to this bill, which I ask to have printed.

The proposed amendments were ordered to be printed, and are as follows:

Amend section 1, in line 16, after the word "Treasury," by inserting:

"And the Secretary of the Interior shall also ascertain and certify to the Secretary of the Treasury the amount of sales of public lands made in the State of California since the admission of said State into the Union, including the amount of such lands entered or located in said State with military scrip or land warrants."

And after the word "acres," in line 21, same section, add the following:

"And to pay to the said State of California 5 per cent. of the proceeds of such public lands, estimating the lands entered or located with military scrip or land warrants at $1.25 per acre; and money received by said State under the provisions of this act shall be held by the said State of California as a school fund, the interest upon which shall be used in aid of the support of the common schools of said State."

Mr. CONGER. Mr. President——

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CONGER. I would prefer to speak to-night unless the Senator wishes to go into executive session.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I have moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CONGER. Can I retain the floor?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will have the floor for to-morrow morning.

Mr. CONGER. Very well.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I renew my motion.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and seven minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at five o'clock and fifty-three minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, May 17, 1882.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. F. D. POWER.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for the regular order for the purpose of securing all the time possible for debate on the banking bill consistent with a vote to-day.

Mr. HUBBELL. Will the gentleman allow me to introduce two or three bills for reference only?

Mr. RANDALL. I cannot do so.

Mr. BUCKNER. I desire to say to my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. CRAPO] who is in charge of this bill that there is one side of this question which has not yet been fairly represented in the debate; and while I have not the least desire that discussion shall continue beyond proper limits, I do think there ought not to be any time fixed now for closing the debate. I do not wish to put any obstruction in the way of reaching a vote in a reasonable time.

Mr. CRAPO. Let me say to my colleague on the committee [Mr. BUCKNER] that, as the RECORD will show, very much more than half of the time thus far given to discussion on this bill has been occupied by the opponents of the bill.

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is surely mistaken in that statement. Besides, sir, the gentlemen of the Greenback party represent their own views, not those of the Democratic party. I believe but two Democrats have thus far spoken in opposition to the bill, although several have spoken in its favor. I think that common fairness ought to be observed in this matter. I stood second on the list of those who were to speak in opposition to the bill. I had no opportunity yesterday to do so; and now I understand it is proposed this morning that the friends of the bill shall occupy the whole time.

Mr. RANDALL. My anxiety was simply to secure all the time possible for debate consistent with getting a vote to-day.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that recognition has been fairly accorded to the different sides, and will be.

Mr. CRAPO. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] spoke an hour last night.

Mr. REAGAN. Oh, nobody was here last night.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the call of committees for reports.

Mr. MILLS. I move to dispense with the morning hour for the call of committees.

The motion was agreed to, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

EXTENSION ON NATIONAL-BANK CHARTERS.

Mr. CRAPO. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the further consideration of the special order, the bill (H. R. No. 4167) to enable national banking associations to extend their corporate existence. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HARDENBERGH] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CRAPO. Before the gentleman from New Jersey proceeds I would ask gentlemen on the other side of the House how much time they desire, and when in their judgment the general debate on this bill should terminate.

Mr. PAGE. Let it run on for to-day.

Mr. REAGAN. I have no authority to represent this side of the House. I have an hour, but not wishing to occupy the whole time myself, I am under promise to my colleague [Mr. MILLS] to yield a portion of it to him.

Mr. MILLS. I shall be content if my colleague has an hour, and will ask no time for myself.

Mr. CRAPO. Let me make a proposition that by unanimous consent all general debate on this bill shall be closed at four o'clock to-day. That will give us five hours, and I assure gentlemen on the other side that they shall have half of it.

Mr. BUCKNER. I make a suggestion to gentlemen on the other side that debate be closed to-day, and that the bill and amendments be voted on at ten o'clock to-morrow. There is to be a trial of speed to-day and some members desire to witness it.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. Is there a proposition, Mr. Speaker, that the business of this Congress shall be suspended for the benefit of a horse race?

Mr. BUCKNER. No, sir; but I suggest that opportunity be given during the day for all who may desire to do so to indulge in the debate upon this bill and pending amendments, and that to-morrow the vote shall be taken. It is a perfectly fair proposition.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not think there is any objection to closing the debate at four o'clock to-day.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection to fixing the time indicated.

Mr. REAGAN. If it is understood that the friends of the measure are to parcel out the remainder of the time and to refuse to let the opponents on this side of the House to be heard, I for one cannot consent to it.

The SPEAKER. That cannot be done.

Mr. RANDALL. The Chair will protect the gentleman in that respect.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will protect gentlemen on both sides of the House in their rights. In the judgment of the Chair the friends of the measure do not desire to be unfair about it.

Mr. REAGAN. Very well, then, if both sides of the House are to have fair play.

Mr. RANDALL. Of course the Chair will have the assignment of the floor, and neither side will be given undue advantage over the other.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts, that general debate shall be closed on this bill at four o'clock to-day, is agreed to.

Mr. CRAPO. I make the further suggestion, Mr. Speaker, that there shall be no debate under the five-minue rule on mere pro forma amendments.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. There is no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts suggests, when the House proceeds to consider the bill and pending amendments under the five-minute rule, that debate shall be limited to five minutes on each side on substantive amendments.

Mr. REAGAN. I hope that order will not be agreed to at this time.

Mr. HOLMAN. That can only be done after the five-minute debate has commenced.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HARDENBERGH] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HARDENBERGH. Mr. Speaker, I am not unaware of the responsibility that devolves upon me to-day as the Representative not only of one of the Congressional districts of New Jersey, but as a representative of the American people. I come to its discharge without any note and without any brief. I care not to deal in the dull details of figures which have been pronounced and read and repeated within the last three days before this House during every hour. I am here, sir, notwithstanding the remark that was made by the gentleman from Texas that I had no right as the president of a national bank to vote on this question.

I am here to accept the responsibility of my position without fear and without favor, and to denounce any attempt made by that spirit of unfairness and injustice which aims to strike at the national banking system of the country through any representative on the floor of legislation who may chance to have business connections with them.

Sir, when seven years ago I took my seat and with uplifted hand swore there to support the Constitution of the United States and the laws made in accordance therewith, my people, who gave me that commission by a majority of more than 5,000 votes, without any effort on my part, deemed I was sufficiently fair and unprejudiced to discharge my duties as an American Representative. Since then they have seen proper to retain me in the position I have occupied; and I come to it with a spirit to discharge simply what I believe to be its duties as a matter of right to my people, as well as in a spirit of justice and fairness to all, and in opposition to that miserable, wretched spirit of communism and socialism now extending itself throughout the land, which threatens capital in whatever shape or whatever amount or however it be invested with the most dire and dreadful consequences.

Why, sir, it was but two days ago, in my morning mail, came a letter signed by generous-hearted Peter Cooper, of New York, a man ninety-two years of age, a man who has been known, honored, and trusted by the American people; whose whole life has been one of benevolence, piety, and justice, and now in his declining years, when the shadows of the next world are gathering thick around him, and when his mind cannot be in the course of nature as clear and bright and strong as it was, indorses doctrines the most unwise in our financial history. His name is too honored in our history to permit the foundations of a proper conservatism to be swept away. In that pamphlet to which I have referred is quoted a suggestion which I venture to assert few of you would be willing to give countenance, and I am quite sure Mr. Cooper does not. What is that doctrine? Read it, representatives of the people, and you will understand it better. You will see that, instead of strikes against labor, suggestions are made to men to save three months of their wages to buy Gatling-guns and, with three months of provisions, to crush out monopolies of whatever kind. And this, Mr. Speaker, in a representative government of the American people. Crush where you can monopolied power, but let it be done by proper process of law. Why, sir, what can there be behind all this crusade upon the national banks? Men are tender in their utterances about it as if they were afraid to speak their minds. I believe in educating the people and elevating them to a full knowledge of these great questions rather than pander to sentiments born of hasty and unreasoning prejudice. [Applause.]

I hope to be equal to my trust and to be able to perform the duties of my position, and I tell you gentlemen when you ask me what my people think upon a certain question—I tell you in response that they sent me here to perform my sworn duty as a Representative, and vote for them and to think for them, and act here according to my own judgment and conviction as to what is right; and if I had not that spirit in my breast, and if I did not dare to discharge that duty in the way that my conscience dictates, I should be ashamed of my American manhood. [Applause.]

Now, sir, let us hear some of the utterances which have been used during the discussion upon this question. I will call the attention of the House briefly to some of them, because it would be almost impossible to go through the whole category of infamies which have been charged against this system. Here is a remark that commends itself certainly to the whole American people, and is a very strong one in reference to a measure of this kind. Democrats, I commend it to you who profess to be the guardians of the popular interests. Talking about the national banking system I find these words:

> It is one of the most wicked, defenseless, inexcusable, flagrant cases of a popular swindle that ever came before Congress, not excepting the land-grant, Credit Mobilier, granite contract, river and harbor, whisky bill, or other swindles that have disgraced the Congressional legislation of the past, or threaten it at the present moment.

Mr. MILLER. Who is that by?

Mr. HARDENBERGH. Mr. BURROWS, of Missouri. Sir, if I could see such features in this poor banking act, so ruthlessly assailed, I would be among the first to crush it by my vote.

The American people have been wandering through the mazes for more than fifty years for a currency that could pass at once and without variance from Maine to Florida and from the Atlantic to the Pacific. They never found it until, when the war of the rebellion was begun and the necessity of a currency was a vital one to the Government, the national banking system was inaugurated and given to the country. I had no part in that action. I had nothing to do with it. I am to deal with facts and principles as I find them here to-day. I am to know what is best for my people, and in my judgment to apply the remedy for any public demand which my best judgment shall dictate. I have been advised by letters, time and often, to be careful of my public political aspirations as to what I may say upon the national banking system lest it may thwart them all. Sir, I will accept all the responsibility and will in face of all such opposition stand by what I conceive to be the principles of justice and right. [Applause.]

Now, sir, I have thought that in this war which has been waged against this national banking system there were other interests behind it. Can you conceive that a system that has been acceptable for twenty years to the American people should all of a sudden, within the last six months, especially since Congress has been in session, be found so imperfect that we have been called upon by a pressing public demand not only to denounce but to degrade and crush it, and to refuse to extend their charters, merely because the system is in the interest of monopoly? There must be something else behind all this. The movement is not an honest one. It may be the tariff; it may be railroad monopolies; but there is something behind it. It is not a spontaneous movement. It has not the sanction of the American people, and never can and never will have this sanction.

You and I have been in our brief life-time witnesses of great events in American history. We have seen how the swelling tide of public opinion has risen and surged from one end of the Republic to the other. We remember the days of Know-nothingism, when a man was compelled to announce where his great grandfather was born, and when the tattered remnants of a political piety were flaunted upon the cross of an insulted Saviour. That was considered then as American patriotism, but buried and damned to-day and forever, as it will be by any republic on earth which seeks to create distinctions between its citizens or refuses to extend to the humblest citizen the broad shield of its common protection.

What next? Then came the mighty exigencies of war. What carried us through that war? It was not the greenbacks. My friend from Pennsy'vania [Mr. BRUMM] announces the greenback as the redeemer, the great redeemer of his country. Why, sir, the redeemer that I acknowledge is always at par, and can save you under any circumstances; but the redeemer of my friend rose and fell in its redemption power, and you never can tell whether you are saved or whether you are lost. [Laughter.]

Now, one word in the interest of labor, in the interest of the workingmen, whose friend I am. An heir of toil myself, I have never known a day that I could call my own. Devoted through all my life to the exercise of the duties of my every-day employments, I stand up here, and no matter how any one here may profess to you anti-monopoly feelings, I dare to say what I believe to be right, and I care not how it may be construed, because opposition to monopolied power has ever been with me a controlling sentiment.

The whole point of this national banking business is this: there are just two sentiments that control the whole of it. You may recite the history of your Treasury notes and all your greenbacks, and the principles of Jefferson and of Jackson and of Hamilton, from the foundation of the Government down; but this I will say, that we have not yet reached the very pith and marrow of this question so as to decide what are the duties that we owe as their representatives to the American people. By a law that was passed some few years ago the national banking act was made general; any seven citizens accumulating a capital of $50,000 could organize a national bank. All the monopoly features of it were taken away. Each community had its own little bank. Perhaps on the one side of the street you might find a bank composed of Democrats, while on the other side you might find a bank composed of Republicans. I have only to say that the bank of which I am president has nine Republicans and two Democrats within it; and the question as to what my views were when I came here to Congress was never asked and never known.

The point is simply this: these national banks go on under a general law now in force. There has been no movement made by Congress to repeal the charters under the national-bank act. Strange that in all these utterances that have been made against them; strange that in all the eloquence that has been uttered, there never has been a sentiment yet expressed that I have heard in favor of the entire abolition of the national-bank act.

What, then, is to be done? I said to you I speak in the interest of labor as a workingman, in the interests of workingmen; and I will prove it to you. Your national-bank charters go on. The banks have the power to liquidate, to wind up, and they have the power to renew. As I said to you in a few brief words the other day, the liquidation of the banks compels the division of its reserve fund; and you have to divide within the next year, during which the charters of these banks expire, one hundred and twenty-eight millions of money and thus force the withdrawal of that amount of money from the industrial interests of the country, which I insist must produce a commercial revulsion and throw my people out of employment, for there is nothing that can take its place. You cannot issue greenbacks for it. You cannot issue Treasury notes for it. You must gather it from your industries and pay it to your people. A revulsion, a panic is the result. And if that measure is to be forced upon the country by the Democracy, or by its adherents, God save their future! I know not what it will be.

Sir, I have never been accustomed from my seat on this floor to deliver harangues about the public interests and about the people. I propose to do them service by my votes rather than by my voice. You elevate labor and it will take care of itself. By all this nonsense about the poor man you degrade him all the time instead of trying to elevate him to the duties of citizenship and to teach him by proper education the right exercise of the responsibilities that are upon him. When you do this, then and then only will you sweep back from your land this infernal tide of communism and of socialism that is abroad. It is time that bold words were uttered in the American Congress upon this question. It is time that the crowds which are every day arriving on our shores and that are diffused throughout our people, coming here with that desire for liberty which seeks without license for the aggregation of its powers—it is time we should remind ourselves in decisive yet kindly language that that is only liberty that is properly protected by American law.

I have now said upon this question all that I have cared to say. I announce myself the plain, unfaltering friend of the national-bank system until some better one is produced. I would have extended the charters of the banks for ten years instead of for twenty if my view had been the ruling one, because I do believe that within the limits of ten years the condition of your national debt will be such that some other mode must be adopted. But what that shall be I do not now know. I cannot accept the remarks of my friend from New York [Mr. HEWITT] upon that subject, his scheme being one whereby each bank shall become the protector of the other. That makes a monopoly gigantic in all its actions, to which I never could subscribe. But that these assailed institutions, taxed to death, scattered throughout our land, 2,000 in number, should be the subject of ridicule as being monopolies does seem to me to be one of the most absurd doctrines ever uttered in the American Congress. My great purpose is to use these institutions to sustain our industries which give wage to labor and enthrone in happiness the homes and the countenances of my toiling poor.

My position is simply this: if you compel these banks to divide up all their reserves you will thereby force a contraction of the currency to the extent of $128,000,000, which no greenback theory can provide against. And the men who are now struggling to make a living for themselves and their families with their wages of a dollar and a half or two dollars a day will be presenting themselves before you here as they did during the years of 1877 and 1878, in their meetings every night about your Capitol demanding some protection, demanding that some action be taken by you that would furnish them with bread or with labor.

Mr. HASELTINE. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HARDENBERGH. Certainly.

Mr. HASELTINE. I would inquire of the gentleman if this Congress cannot enact a law that would authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to put in circulation enough legal tender to provide for any contraction of national-bank currency that might take place?

Mr. HARDENBERGH. I will say to my friend that this Congress can enact a great many laws. It enacted the other day what I consider a very strange law, as contrary to the genius of our institutions, the Chinese immigration bill. Congress might give to the Secretary of the Treasury the power to issue Treasury notes to fill up the gap caused by the contraction of national-bank currency. But it is my opinion that the American people never will consent to give such a power as that to any Secretary of the Treasury. You had not long since one in that office in whom you thought you could repose every trust. Yet against him to-day the vilest of reproaches are thundered, and the public newspapers throughout the country are speaking of the powers which you gave him and the manner in which he exercised those powers. I mean the late Secretary of the Treasury.

While I have no right to speak of a member of the other branch of Congress, I will say to my friend from Missouri [Mr. HASELTINE] that some day we might have a Secretary of the Treasury with a worse character than Mr. SHERMAN, who might exercise all these powers in a manner to suit himself. Then where would you probably be? Recollect that you can lead a horse to water but you cannot make him drink.

Mr. BRUMM. Restrain him by law.

Mr. HARDENBERGH. What law can restrain him? Congress sometimes adjourns from the 4th day of March until the first Monday in the following December. What exigencies might arise during that period no one can say. Suppose that you give this power to the Secretary of the Treasury. Can any man tell what it would be worth to one who was his nearest and best friend?

No, sir; the power to issue the currency of the country is properly where it now is, scattered throughout the several States. It is a wonder to me that the fathers of those who are now members here never raised their voices against the State banks when charters were given to them, and they could simply upon their own credit issue currency to the extent of three times their capital, and then when panics came the people, instead of receiving money from them, received the answer, "We cannot pay you."

Mr. HASELTINE. I would like to ask the gentleman another question.

Mr. HARDENBERGH. Very well.

Mr. HASELTINE. Do you not think that the American people would be quite as safe with the power to issue this currency given to the Secretary of the Treasury as they are now with the power exercised by interested capitalists and money speculators?

Mr. HARDENBERGH. Now, sit down and I will tell you. I have great faith in the American people, and in their honest intention to select those best qualified to represent them. There are two hundred and ninety-seven men in this House. Yet I once knew a man who sat in Congress since I came here who, it was said, had paid $120,000 for his election. Was that honest? Add to that the powers of a Gould and of a Vanderbilt, exercising the influence they do by means of the immense corporations they control, and where is your Congress, and where will be the rights of the people? It is not right to give any man a power like that.

Mr. HASELTINE. One other question.

Mr. HARDENBERGH. Certainly.

Mr. HASELTINE. Then, does the gentleman acknowledge that republican government is a failure and that we cannot trust the American Congress?

Mr. HARDENBERGH. To a certain extent I say so. With the present contamination of our politics and the manner in which railroad and other monopolies influence legislation, I tell you that you are not safe. First educate the people, not to communism, not to socialism, but in the principles of Democracy and of a pure government.

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. Would not the Supreme Court of the United States hold that a further issue of legal tenders would be unconstitutional?

Mr. HARDENBERGH. No doubt about that.

Mr. BRUMM. Then it would contradict its own decisions.

Mr. HARDENBERGH. If I had my own way I would fund the $346,000,000 of legal tender now afloat. I remember when meetings were held here and members of Congress were called out to give their opinions and a clamor was raised for currency, for the legal tenders which had been retired to be reissued. Congress then voted that the Secretary of the Treasury should reissue these legal tenders, and they are now afloat among the people to-day.

I say that if you attempt to extend the volume of the currency, to give any such power to the Secretary of the Treasury, or even to a commission or to Congress itself, the faith of your people in the soundness of the currency will begin to droop and your securities will depreciate in value. And when that shall come tell me who will be the losers? It will not be the men who sit in the seats of money power, but the man who carries his hod in danger of his life from the bottom to the top of the ladder, and who at the end of the day receives a dollar and a half for his labor

During this discussion the Committee on Banking and Currency has been fearfully arraigned on subjects connected with this question; and here I may quote a remark made to me this morning by my eloquent friend from Brooklyn while we were riding up in the car. He said that reason may not always leave her throne, but madness often sits beside her and conducts her to improprieties. That is the case with many in the American Congress to-day.

I have said that without any question as to what the future of the banking currency shall be beyond the next ten years, I would not seek to perpetuate the national debt one hour in order to continue the national banking system. While I have asked this House to adopt such legislation as will prevent a panic, I have on the other hand asked that you shall prevent what will be left of the national banking system from becoming one of the most complete monopolies in the land. My fight is for labor; my fight is for the people. It is special laws given to corporations which wrest power from the people, and not general laws, whose provisions are open to all.

Mr. HASELTINE. As the gentleman is making an argument in behalf of labor, I ask him whether the people are not better protected in their rights through the American Congress than they can be through any licensed institutions of speculators?

Mr. HARDENBERGH. Mr. Speaker, I will answer the gentleman's question at once. I have always had the reputation of being a rather good-natured man—willing to oblige my friends; and since I have been a member of Congress I doubt whether one mail out of six or seven has come to me without some application for a position either in the navy-yard at New York, or in the municipal government at home, or upon some railroad with which the Government is connected. Unfortunately, sir, I have not been on such terms with any of the ruling authorities as would enable me to respond favorably to these various applications. I have seen those who are dependent upon their labor coming here and asking Congress to afford them some measure of relief, and they have never obtained it. The duties of a Representative are disconnected from the toil of the citizen. We are, to be sure, to enact laws for his benefit; but we must leave those laws to work out their results in their own sphere, without regard to the interests of particular individuals. Give us such laws as will harmonize labor with capital, and not such a kind of legislation as will prevent the smoke to curl from the chimneys of our factories.

I fully recognize the doctrine that this is a Government of and for the whole people. My friend makes a speech opposed to this bill and, as he conceives, in the interest of the people. I make a speech in its favor, desiring to prevent such a panic as must ensue from the withdrawal of one hundred and twenty-eight millions of currency. I desire to keep at work men who are connected with the different industries of the country—to secure their homes, to secure their happiness. Allow me to speak now as the president of a national bank having $250,000 of capital and $225,000 of surplus. There is another one similarly circumstanced within my city; and there is one twice as large. Now, what am I to do? I have been trying for the last five years to find occupation for those who have been applying to me in every branch of industry that I could reach by proper means and with all the personal influences that I could command. This has been one struggle and duty of my life. I labor in this direction wherever I can. But if this Congress shall refuse to pass this bill the community which I represent, embracing a population of 120,000, with industrial establishments involving a capital of $4,000,000 or $5,000,000, in which from 3,000 to 5,000 men gather for their daily work, cannot but suffer disaster. If those who with their ideas of finance believe it to be their duty to make war upon these banking institutions shall succeed, the inevitable result must be that these industrial establishments must reduce their force; and this will be charged upon the national banks.

Why this outcry against the national banks? A year ago, when the withdrawal of $18,000,000 of banking capital almost forced a panic, was it the banks that were responsible? No; it was Congress. Acting under the evil influences then operating, Congress undertook to force the banks to surrender at once the bonds upon which they were receiving 5 per cent. interest and to accept bonds on which but 3 or 3½ per cent. would be realized. As the guardians of property interests—the property interests of widows and orphans among others—the banks sought protection for those property interests. Yet although in this they acted simply as a man who defends his own existence, you condemn them for the efforts they made to save their credit and to give proper care to the interests committed to them. It matters not to me personally what may become of this bill.

Mr. HASELTINE. The gentleman will allow me to ask him what motive induced the national banks to contract their currency to the extent of $29,000,000 between 1875 and 1878, while the people all over the land were suffering hard times.

Mr. HARDENBERGH. I do not know that they did so.

Mr. HASELTINE. The Comptroller's report shows it.

Mr. HARDENBERGH. All the evidence within my knowledge shows the contrary. Now, the gentleman regards the national-bank system as a great monopoly. He thinks its powers and privileges are dangerous to the interests of the community. I will say that in my city to-day there are depositors who could, if they chose, frighten and shut up every bank within that city. Capital is timid; it does not dare to defy public opinion; it must do what is right; it must conform to the action of Congress. The national banks must obey
